That instead of trying to boost the salary lists you would be trying to lower the level in order that you might get down to normal. That is what you would be doing as business men. And our leader is appealing to the credulity rather than the intelligence of the membership of this House, for if we do proceed as business men we will put a block under this thing until such time as we may know what normal conditions will be and can act with some degree of intelligence, at least.

There is not a single man who is in favor of this bill who will contend for a single moment that it will not largely increase the pay roll. There is no one here who knows the natural disposition and tendency to increase wages from the lowest to the highest but what knows that that will obtain under this bill which has always obtained. There is not a man here but knows that each head of the department has been coming down under the present plan and asking for largely increased wages for everybody under his employ. Now, they will not come to the Congress, but they will do it under this bill themselves. They can fix the increased salary themselves. Do you think they will be different when they have got the power in their own hands than when they had to come here and appeal to us to do it?

Now we have some opportunity to know what they are doing. Then we will have no opportunity.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Has the Bureau of the Budget submitted the increases asked for by the departments or for the Appropriations Committee to allow?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. In some instances, yes; in many instances, no. But the Bureau of the Budget will have but little to do with it. Mr. Dawes said before our committee the other day that formulating policy is not a part of the business of the budget. It is their business to see that money appropriated shall go as far as it can be made to go. So the increased cost of service and the promotion of the employees is lodged entirely in the hands of the men who are at the head of these departments, without any supervision on your part at all, as long as they keep within the minimum and the maximum range.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to have about five minutes. I have not talked on this bill at all. I have not taken a bit of the time of the House except on the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LEHLBACH. The gentleman from Illinois has reserved the right to object.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If I can get five minutes, I will not object.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon the bill or any amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Make it 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to limit debate, but I do object to a precedent being established attempting to limit debate on the bill. Under the rules of the House you can not limit debate on the bill if an amendment is presented, because the rule says there shall be five minutes' debate.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have studied this bill with what care I could. I have made up my mind I can not support it, but I do believe that a decent regard for the situation requires me to have some good reasons why I do not support it. I think I have such reasons, and I want to give them to you:

1. This bill, by the admission of everyone who has participated in this discussion, raises the aggregate of the salaries of the civil-service employees of the Government. Three years after the end of the war, with the price of living decreasing, this is not justifiable, in my judgment.

2. The bill in effect continues the war bonus to Government employees in the District of Columbia and in the field service indefinitely. The bonus was a temporary allowance intended to provide for the increased cost of living occasioned by the war, and to obviate the necessity of a permanent increase in salary. To continue this bonus further is, in my judgment, unjustifiable.

3. The bill proposes to add to the basic salary of every civil-service employee $240 without respect to whether the salary of such employee is now too low or too high.

4. The bill deprives Congress of its right and duty to appropriate specific sums for statutory salaries, but will necessitate lump-sum appropriations for that purpose—an unsafe and dangerous method of making appropriations.

5. It extends the functions of the Bureau of the Budget and makes of it a wage-fixing body, something that was not originally intended, and which impairs the usefulness of that bureau.

6. It divides responsibility between the Civil Service Commission, the Bureau of the Budget, and the head of a department, where such employees are used, thus depriving the head of the department of control over his department, and at the same time lessening his responsibility for what occurs in his department.

7. The bill leaves to the head of a department the rating of an employee as to salary. The result of this will be that within a few years every employee in each classification will be drawing the maximum salary, thus entailing a maximum expenditure of public funds. The power should be retained by Congress to determine the number to be employed at each grade.

8. Finally we have no knowledge of the extent of the expenditures made necessary by the passage of this bill.

In the absence of such knowledge we ought not to proceed.

For these reasons, which I think are good, I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, without recurring to the figures and comparisons that for the last four days and for two days before the recess we have constantly placed before this Committee, I now say emphatically—and I say it advisedly; I say it upon my reputation as a Member of this body, and upon my reputation for veracity—that this bill as it stands now will not cause any substantial increase in the cost of the maintenance of the civil service. [Applause.]

I say, in further answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], that instead of perpetuating and extending the system of lump-sum appropriations, in so far as the payment of the personnel of the Government is concerned, it abolishes it. It will compel every department, every division, every bureau in detail to state how many clerks in this grade of the service and in that grade of the service they require; how many they require in the next grade, and so on.

The grades are defined, and the qualities necessary for an employee in that grade are set forth in the law itself. The range of salary is fixed by Congress in the law for an employee having those qualifications and performing those duties. Consequently the Committee on Appropriations, when this classification goes into effect, will for the first time know just exactly what all the employees asked for are to do, and it can with intelligence say whether the number asked for in any particular bureau or division is excessive or not, and can intelligently reduce the number without impairing the efficiency of any division or bureau or office of the Government. It absolutely abolishes the lump-sum appropriation and puts the conduct of the Government's business on a business basis.

The Bureau of the Budget now has the duty imposed upon it—and it was created for that purpose—of taking the various department estimates, coordinating them, revising and reducing them, and bringing them together in one budget, and submitting it to the President, by him to be transmitted to Congress. To do that it must of necessity have knowledge of what each division and each bureau is doing, and what the employees in that division or bureau are supposed to do; and it enables it to revise intelligently the allocations of the various grades in the service. It is the one body in this Government having the financial responsibility to which we ought to intrust the final revision of these allocations with the reasonable assurance that the work will be done efficiently and honestly.

It is not true at all that the authority and the responsibility are divided between the Bureau of the Budget, the Bureau of Efficiency, and the Civil Service Commission. The Bureau of the Budget can require the Bureau of Efficiency to render such aid and assistance and furnish such information as may be necessary, and it can require the Civil Service Commission to aid it. But the Bureau of the Budget is the boss, and these two other establishments are merely to place at the disposal of the Bureau of the Budget all the resources of information and work which they possess. [Applause.]

I wish to say that this bill is intended to eradicate inequalities, make uniformity throughout the service, and establish an efficiency system, so that we may be reasonably sure that for every dollar of wages we pay we can get a commensurate return in honest work. It makes for efficiency, it makes for uniformity, it makes for equality and justice, and it makes for economy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to make a correction on page 14, line 2. The word "position" should be "positions," plural.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to correct the word "position" in line 14 of page 2. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 5, line 21, for the following purpose: It was the intention of the committee, and it was stated that wherever an employee, after he is allocated to the proper grade, is found to receive at the present time pay in excess of the range of salary of that grade, he should be reduced to a salary within that grade. It was thought that the bill ought to carry a specific provision to that effect, to insure absolutely that such reduction shall be made. For that reason I ask unanimous consent that this amendment be incorporated at the point indicated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to return to page 5 for the purpose of offering and considering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, may we hear the amendment read first?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to be proposed, if consent is granted, for the information of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: Amend, page 5, on line 21, by inserting a new paragraph, to read as follows:

"5. If the employee is receiving compensation in excess of the range of salary prescribed for the appropriate grade, the compensation shall be reduced to the rate within the grade nearest the present compensation."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to returning to page 5 for the purpose of considering the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH], which has just been reported for the information of the committee?

There was no objection?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEHLBACH: Amend, page 5, on line 21, by inserting a new paragraph, to read as follows:

"5. If the employee is receiving compensation in excess of the range of salary prescribed for the appropriate grade, the compensation shall be reduced to the rate within the grade nearest the present compensation."

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. CLOUSE. Before a vote is taken I want to ask the gentleman from New Jersey just one question. The gentleman says he shall be reduced to the grade nearest the present rate of compensation. What does he mean by that—the salary he is getting over and above the rate fixed in the bill?

Mr. LEHLBACH. He is to be reduced if he falls within a certain grade of the service, or a range, we will say, between $3,000 and $3,400, and it is found that he is getting $4,000, he would be reduced from $4,000 to the salary in the grade nearest to it. It makes mandatory a reduction of pay where a man is getting excessive wages.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report to the House the bill with the amendments agreed upon, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey moves that the committee do now rise and report back to the House the bill with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WALSH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8928) to provide for the classification of civilian positions within the District of Columbia and in the field services, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to the final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey moves the previous question on the bill and all amendments to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask a separate vote on the amendments reducing the schedules of salaries as stated in section 12 of the bill—the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks a separate vote on the amendments specified. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put the other amendments in gross.

The other amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment on which a separate vote is demanded.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, we all understand thoroughly what these amendments are to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] alludes. They are the amendments reducing the salary schedules in the various grades from the figures originally in the bill when reported to the figures submitted by the committee in the amendments which were adopted from time to time. I therefore ask unanimous consent that we may proceed to a vote on the amendments without their being reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the reading of the amendments be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. LONDON), there were—ayes 159, noes 9.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote, as it discloses the absence of a quorum. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members. As many as are in favor of the amendment will as their names are called vote "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 281, nays 28, answered "present" 3, not voting 120, as follows:

Mr. MALONEY with Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi.

Mr. LAWRENCE with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado.

Mr. BEEDY with Mr. RAINEY of Alabama.

Mr. JEFFERIS of Nebraska with Mr. HUMPHREYS.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], and as I do not know how he would vote on this proposition I withdraw my vote of "aye" and desire to be recorded as answering "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to recommit the bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana demands the yeas and nays. Forty-one gentlemen have arisen. It requires 63 to demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays are therefore refused. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WOOD of Indiana) there were 61 ayes and 157 noes.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was being taken, when Mr. LEHLBACH demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 246, nays 65, answered "present" 4, not voting 117, as follows:

On motion of Mr. LEHLBACH, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF STARVING PEOPLE IN RUSSIA.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution.

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering H. R. 9548, being a bill for the relief of distressed and starving people of Russia. There shall be not to exceed two hours of general debate on the said bill, the time for such general debate to be controlled one-half by those favoring the bill and one-half by those opposing it. Thereupon the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. Upon the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the bill shall be reported to the House with such amendments as may have been agreed to; whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and on all amendments thereto, to final passage, without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, before referring to the resolution just reported, I want to announce for the benefit of the membership of the House, many of whom have asked me when the antilynching bill will be called up, that it will be called up following the disposition of this bill to-morrow morning. It is expected that this bill will take a very short time out of to-morrow. The antilynching bill will follow that.

Mr. Speaker, the nature of this bill and the conditions it undertakes to remedy make a very strong appeal not only to the people of the United States but to the people of the whole world. The conditions existing in Russia to-day are most pitiable. It is doubtful if any people have ever suffered the woes that the people of Russia have suffered within the past four years and are suffering now. Added to their other ills is famine. Men, women, and children are starving to death. The United States has an abundance of food. It is the richest and most productive country in the world. The people in Russia, with a vast empire, rich in every variety of resource, with a fertile soil, as fertile as any beneath the sun, are to-day realizing the reality of an idealistic dream that had for its object the betterment of mankind. In reality mankind is suffering under it as mankind has never suffered before under any régime in all the world. There has never been such cruelty, there has never been such inhumanity as there is in Russia to-day, and as there has been during the entire socialistic régime in that unhappy country. There has never been a time when hope has been so taken out of men, women, and children as in Russia to-day. The opportunity for reward for individual effort is gone. The people are driven like galley slaves to their tasks. If they accumulate anything, it is taken from them without pay. Thus it is that an unhappy condition exists under a socialism in Russia which beggars description. Production fails largely because there is no reward to the producer. An appeal is made by a socialistic condition to a capitalistic government, to use socialistic parlance, to save millions of starving people from a ruin that has in large part been brought upon them by reason of the blight of the socialism, the communism, and the bolshevism under which they live.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will $20,000,000 out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this Republic, bringing food to them without effort, in any way turn them from their way toward socialism and realizing the reality of an idealistic dream?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We can not relieve all of the distress there with $20,000,000 worth of food. That is impossible, but we can not afford to deny to the starving there the $20,000,000 worth of food that we are so abundantly able to send them simply because they are the victims of a socialistic state.

Mr. Speaker, the rule provides that there shall be not to exceed two hours of general debate upon the bill and at the end of the general debate the bill may be considered for amendment. I have discussed with members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and because of questions that have arisen have discussed with Secretary Hoover, under whose direction the provisions of the bill will be put into operation in all probability, the probable method of acquiring the grain that is to be shipped to the people who are suffering in Russia.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. After I make a brief statement. Secretary Hoover tells me that it has been arranged and is being arranged that the food shall be assembled through elevators, without profits to the elevators, and that it shall be transported to the port of departure from this country at reduced rates, if possible, upon the railroads, thus enabling as large an amount of grain as is possible to be secured for $20,000,000 to be shipped to these people.

Of the $20,000,000 to be appropriated under this bill $19,000,000 are now in the hands of the Grain Corporation, a corporation formed during the war, of which the President is the sole stockholder. That corporation is now being liquidated and its affairs closed up. This money would soon be turned into the Treasury of the United States. It is proposed by this bill to divert it to the purchase of food provided for in the bill. In the purchase of the food, as I have stated, it is proposed that as much grain shall be purchased as is possible, and every element of waste and of cost is to be eliminated in the administration of the disposition of the food. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat concerned about the use of the term "Russia." Russia is a rather indefinite geographical term at the present time. Does the bill refer to Russia proper or does it include the Baltic countries, the Caucasian countries, Chita and others? What was in the contemplation of the committee at the time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not advised as to that. That will have to be answered by the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. What kind of grain is to be shipped?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Wheat and corn are the grains contemplated, together with some milk.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. In what proportion?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think about three of corn to one of wheat.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. I wanted to say in reply to the question of my colleague from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] that, so far as the administration is concerned, when it speaks of Russia, it speaks of the former Empire of Russia minus Poland and Finland.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Is the gentleman a member of the committee?

Mr. LONDON. I understand that to be the present view of the administration.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have not inquired into that, but that would be my idea of it.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. That is the American contemplation of Russia, but that is not the contemplation of the French or of the British. I think the French have recognized the independence of Esthonia.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I will say to the gentleman from New York that, so far as the practical application of this relief is concerned, the real purpose is to relieve the Russian distress in the Volga Valley.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. What is the basis of the gentleman's assertion?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The hearings before the committee, and if the gentleman will read the report of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs he will see that it is proposed to relieve suffering in the Volga Valley.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Then, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] was wrong in his information.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The Volga Valley is somewhat distant from the places the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL].

Mr. CANTRILL. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the Rules Committee is supposed to be the political committee of the House of Representatives, but I am glad to say that in the Committee on Rules there is no political division when it comes to the consideration of a measure which affords relief to millions of people who are now dying and other millions who are upon the verge of starvation. This report from the Committee on Rules is a unanimous report. I sincerely hope that the rule will be unanimously adopted; I think it would be a great tribute to the American people, and I believe they would unanimously indorse the action of the American Congress if the bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs is unanimously passed.

Mr. Speaker, this bill from the Committee on Foreign Affairs in effect means a tax of only $20,000,000—we have 100,000,000 citizens of this great Republic—a tax of 20 cents per capita to save millions of human beings from starvation. At this particular time, near the Christmas time, when the hearts of men are mellowed, and when we undertake to carry out the Divine injunction of rendering help to our fellow men, I do not believe the American Government could pass a law that would serve humanity better and meet the more hearty approval of the American people than this measure. Peace on earth, good will to men. Here is a practical chance, here is a time to put into practice what every true American believes, and I sincerely hope that this bill will have the unanimous approval of this House.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANTRILL. In just a moment, if the gentleman pleases. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, in reading the report of this committee the Committee on Foreign Affairs seems to think that this great distress in Russia has been brought about by two causes: First, the plan of government that is now in existence in Russia; and, second, the great drought that has swept over a great portion of Russia for three years in succession.

These millions of people who are starving to death certainly are not to blame for the great drought which has been sent upon them for three years in succession. The people of America have prospered in the production of their crops. We have more foodstuffs laid away in storage than ever in the history of the country, and in many sections of this great Nation of ours food is being burned for fuel, and yet there are millions of people, without any fault of their own, who before next spring comes will have died, millions of women and children, helpless human beings, our brethren in the human race, and we, the greatest and richest Republic in the world, can certainly not withhold help in this great emergency. I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that this Congress will not for a minute consider that form of government that is now in Russia. A great majority of the people there are not responsible for that form of government. It has been put on them by the force of arms. They are helpless, they are starving, and I think it would be a disgrace, to be frank with you, for the American Congress to stop and haggle about the form of government in Russia, where this great calamity stares them in the face, a calamity to the world at large, if it is not speedily remedied.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANTRILL. I will.

Mr. WINSLOW. For the purpose of obtaining information, I would like to ask the gentleman if he feels it would be wise to continue this proposition of appropriating money for charitable purposes after we have passed, if we should, this bill? Would the gentleman, for instance, favor having us go on and appropriating money for the relief of Armenia, which has suffered longer than Russia?

Mr. CANTRILL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I hardly think that question is pertinent to the bill. It is not worth while to go out on outside measures. We have before the House to-day a specific, concrete proposition that has been thoroughly thrashed out before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, showing the immediate need of millions of starving people. So far as I am concerned, I am frank to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that whenever the opportunity presents itself, so long as my country is as rich as it is to-day, and any other people on the face of the earth of any color anywhere are starving to death, I am willing to vote to help them. [Applause.] Why, I should say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is not only from the standpoint of humanity I would take that stand, but you could get to it from the standpoint of a cold business proposition if you wanted to put it on the basis of dollars and cents. Now, Mr. Speaker, at this particular time I think it would have a splendid effect the world over if the American Congress, by unanimous vote let us hope, could cheerfully grant this relief, which, as I have said, is but a tax of 20 cents per capita upon the American people. I do not believe there is a man, woman, or child in the American Republic who would begrudge a tax of 20 cents to save millions of people in Russia from starving to death. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to delay the proceedings, but I shall oppose this rule and shall oppose the bill. Of course, it is easy at this particular time of year, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL] has pointed out, to consider the United States of America as the Santa Claus of the world, but the gentleman from Kansas has presented a situation which would give rise to the conclusion that the reason this condition exists in Russia is due to some doctrine, to some internal disagreement as to their form of government, and that after presenting that $20,000,000 worth of grain for planting, and milk for their women and children, without any effort on their part, it will bring them to their senses and they will establish a form of government which will not permit a recurrence of this dire stress that has overcome them. But, sir, we have some people here at home who we must consider. We are pledged to a program of economy, and are we to say whenever a drought or whenever flood overtakes any unfortunate peoples in the world, any peoples on the inhabited globe, that because the United States is the richest Nation, that aid shall be had out of the Treasury to relieve that at the expense of the taxpayers? I am opposed to any such proposition as that. If this only requires $20,000,000, why do not the civilized peoples of the world, through private subscription and contribution, through organized charities which are undertaking to relieve such situations throughout the globe, handle this?

Why should we put the stamp of approval by legislation upon this and establish a precedent which will cause the people everywhere, no matter how severe or how great the calamity may be which overtakes them, to look to the United States for an appropriation? Oh, yes; I know the Executive has recommended that an appropriation be made for this purpose. But I can not agree with that recommendation, nor can I agree to support the setting of such precedent.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Is it not true that a very celebrated precedent has already been established, in the previous administration, when the Democratic President made a request, which was supported almost unanimously by Congress, to send $100,000,000 abroad for the specific purpose of curing bolshevism through the stomach?

Mr. WALSH. I do not recall any such legislation as that. It was not by an act of this sort.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. This House voted for it.

Mr. WALSH. That money may have been available for a specific purpose. If this is to cure bolshevism, it should say so. If it is to relieve starving people, I am not in favor of doing it in this way, because the people of wealth in other countries, together with the people of wealth in this country, through their organized agencies, can allay this situation and help those people without causing us to be the almoner of the world. We were generous during the war to other peoples. We poured forth our money and our men to help save civilization. We are trying now to get back to normalcy. We are trying now to get back to a program of economy and to see if we can not lift the burdens of taxation from our own people, with many nations yet owing us vast sums of money which were loaned for the purpose of prosecuting the war. And now, sir, to embark upon this program will constitute a precedent which eventually will make our war expenditures look like 30 cents, because other nations will smile and simply say, "There is no need for us to organize our government; no need for us to help ourselves; there is Uncle Sam, who is always ready to appropriate the taxpayer's money for relief." [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I have but five minutes to deal with this vast subject. The chairman of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has shown one thing, that he is not made of presidential timber. The President of the United States has presented this very question in his message. He did not attempt to blame the drought upon the existing government of Russia, but he contented himself by saying that he did not like the propaganda that the present Russian government was carrying on, and that he did not recognize that government.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] would be entirely right in his contention if he were to take the argument of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] as true. But the viewpoint taken by the gentleman from Kansas is a narrow one. Russia lost 4,000,000 men in the war, more than all the Allies combined. Russia had 10,000,000 men wounded. When she declared war upon Germany she declared war upon herself, because 80 per cent of exports and imports were going and coming through Germany. Her industrial life was paralyzed; her commercial life was suspended. A man who understands anything realizes that.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. One moment. I have only five minutes.

Almost the entire youth of Russia was drafted into the army, thus adding to the confusion of industry and agriculture. But much as Russia suffered from the World War, only her frontiers suffered from direct contact with the enemy's armies. The heart of Russia was not affected. It was only after the Allies, and particularly the French bondholders, the international usurers of the world, attempted to force a collection of their bonds—it was only after this Government, together with the other allied or associate powers, began to aid the imperialist policy of France, so as to permanently cripple Russia and to prevent her from getting into friendly contact with her neighbors—it was only after money and munitions had been supplied by the Allies to every charlatan and every adventurer who was ready to carry on a civil war against the government of Russia—it was only after the blockade that she was completely wrecked.

The Denikins, the Wrangels, the Kolchaks, a monarchist each one of them, flooded the mines, devastated the wheat fields, destroyed the railroads, adding to the horrors of the allied blockade the chaos of internal war. These monarchists, these adherents of the Czar, were all the time being supported by the allied Governments. Without any authority by Congress and without the consent and against the will of the American people, our own Government conducted war upon the Russian people. The appropriation of $20,000,000 to aid the famine-stricken people of the Volga region will be a very poor atonement indeed for the sins we have committed and are committing against the Russian people.

They have a right to their dreams and to seek a change in their own way. We do not understand their psychology. One thing is certain, as was said by Senator REED of Missouri, that the present government of Russia is the best that Russia has ever had. In spite of her inexhaustible resources, Russia has had these famines every 15 or 25 years under the noble government of the Czar. It is easy to employ superlatives. If we give, let us give like men. You can not either fight bolshevism or help it. What is bolshevism? It is the exuberance of revolution. Every revolution carries the people farther than they want to go. The present government of Russia has been compelled to carry on a double war while endeavoring to carry out the theory and the ideals of the revolution. It was inevitable that after the present Russian government had repelled the foreign enemy and had suppressed the fomenters of civil war it should in the attempt to apply its revolutionary theories modify those theories from day to day and yield to the permanent psychology of the people and not to the temporary manifestations of revolutionary fervor.

All government is nothing but a series of expedients, and every student of history will realize it. Three or four years is not by any means too long a term for a people of 150,000,000 souls to get on their feet after suffering a thousand years of oppression under a coercive government. Did you ever protest against the Czar? Did you ever protest against the old czarist government that made of the whole of Russia one endless prison? Why do you speak now with such hatred of the effort of a people groping toward the light, struggling in their own way through their own misery, through their own agony, toward the broad road which I hope will lead them into a permanent and lasting democracy of their own choice? [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the response to the appeal for help will not be made less generous by deploring the conditions that have made it necessary. Notwithstanding the exuberance of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] and his eulogy of socialism or bolshevism—whichever he wants to term it, or both—the fact remains that the unhappy conditions in Russia to-day are due more to Lenin and Trotski and the government they maintain than to any other condition that has existed or exists in Russia. The most inhuman government that ever existed among men has existed under Lenin and Trotski in the past four years in Russia, and everybody knows it who knows the condition there. [Applause.] More men have been murdered for opinion's sake by Lenin and Trotski under bolshevism in Russia than have ever been murdered for opinion's sake in the same period of time in all the history of civilization.

Therefore we deplore the conditions, but the appeal that comes from that unhappy people impels us to make this small appropriation to alleviate the conditions that exist there.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman think we have a right to appropriate Government money for other than Government functions?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We have established precedents for this action. We have appropriated money since I have been in Congress in the last 20 years for the relief of unfortunate conditions that have arisen by reason of earthquakes and floods.

Mr. LONDON. And for Austria, with which we were at war at the time.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And we sent $50,000,000 worth of flour within the past year into Armenia, the Balkan States, Czechoslovakia, and other sections that were afflicted.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. I wish to ask the gentleman if he knows that there is a positive sentiment among the Christian denominations of America that there should be some organized and ample relief afforded to the suffering people of Armenia, and that those people are being ground between the Turkish nationalist movement on the one side and bolshevism on the other, and whether they should be included in this relief measure?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In a bill that we passed a year ago an appropriation was made directing that $50,000,000 worth of flour should be sent abroad for the relief of suffering people there. Much of it was sent into Armenia.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. WALSH. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 108, noes 17.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object to that vote. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 237, nays 44, answered "present" 1, not voting 150, as follows:

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL] was called away on a very important matter. He requested me to state that if he had been present he would have voted "yea."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing in large type a speech of Senator LADD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I understand that a number of gentlemen have suggested to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in charge of the Russian relief bill, the propriety of not beginning the debate on the bill until to-morrow morning. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] desires to call up an election case.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. LUCE. I will.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman from Wyoming state to the House when it is expected that the rule will be called up for the consideration of the antilynching bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Immediately after the conclusion of the consideration of the Russian relief bill to-morrow.

Mr. DYER. To-morrow afternoon?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman from Wyoming state if it is the intention to take up the Russian relief bill the first thing following the reading of the Journal to-morrow?

Mr. MONDELL. The first thing to-morrow morning.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—RAINEY AGAINST SHAW.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the contested-election case of Rainey against Shaw.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] calls up the contested-election case of Rainey against Shaw. The Clerk wil report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Henry T. Rainey was not elected a Representative in this Congress from the twentieth congressional district of the State of Illinois and is not entitled to a seat herein.

Resolved, That Guy L. Shaw was duly elected a Representative in this Congress from the twentieth congressional district of the State of Illinois and is entitled to retain a seat herein.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Elections No. 2 is unanimous in its report upon this case. The facts are set forth in the report, I think adequately, and there seems to be no occasion for any detailed discussion of the matter. It brings up, however, collaterally a problem that might usefully receive the consideration of the Members between this time and whenever the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress shall, if it sees fit, report as to what should be done in view of the circumstances produced by the decision in the so-called Newberry case.

In this contest Mr. Rainey alleged violations of the corrupt practices act by Mr. Shaw; not violations implying any moral obliquity, nor, indeed, any extravagant expenditure of money nor any expenditure that was illegitimate. Technical violations of the law were alleged.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have read the report in the case; but, as I understand it, the contestee did not file answer to the contestant's declaration in the time prescribed by statute.

Mr. LUCE. That was one of the averments.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand that to be a fact.

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The other, as I now recall it, is that a report of the expenditures in the regular elections—to say nothing of the primaries, passing that aside—was not made, or at least was not received by the Clerk of the House, within the time fixed by statute.

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I believe this is a unanimous report from the committee.

Mr. LUCE. It is.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The committee dismissed the matter as being technical and involving no moral questions that the committee regarded as proper to be settled.

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Was there any testimony before the committee to show what the expeditures, in fact, were?

Mr. LUCE. Oh, yes; statements of expenditure were filed, but those now in possession of the Clerk of the House came in late.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What was the total expenditure, if the gentleman remembers?

Mr. LUCE. About $3,000.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. CABLE. Is it not a fact that Mr. Shaw contended that he filed his expense account, and the issue was whether he had filed it or had not filed it in time?

Mr. LUCE. Yes; I think that the gentleman from Tennessee so understood it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understood they were not registered.

Mr. LUCE. They were not registered.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I gathered from the report that the committee found that none of the expenditures, whether made in the primary contest or in the general elections, were for improper purposes.

Mr. LUCE. No; the contestant, before the case was finished, apparently withdrew all suggestion to that effect. There is no question here of impropriety of expenditure, nor of excessive expenditure, but simply a technical violation of the law.

To resume what I had desired to put before the House, the committee learned from the Attorney General that in his opinion so much of the corrupt practices act as relates to filing statements of expenses for elections still survives.

The inference from his letter is that so much of the corrupt practices act as relates to the limit on expenditures in elections has gone. All agree that so much of it as relates to primaries has gone. Within a few hours it has been brought to my attention that there are authorities who contend that in the matter of criminal statutes, if any part of a statute is found unconstitutional the whole statute goes. I have not had opportunity as yet to examine thoroughly those authorities, and I do not desire to commit myself, but if they are valid, then nothing of the corrupt practices act survives. Under the circumstances, whether any of the statute survives or not, it is my own judgment that the people of the country will expect Congress to meet the situation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not understand that the report of the committee in any way takes the position that the whole statute has fallen.

Mr. LUCE. The committee does not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Nor does the report.

Mr. LUCE. No; the committee nor the report; but this particular phase of the matter has just been brought to my attention, raising the question of whether separability, if I may call it such, relating to constitutional issues, differs in the case of criminal statutes from its relation to civil statutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The committee has gone no further than the Supreme Court went in the Newberry case.

Mr. LUCE. No. The committee faced the issues in this particular contest with the letter of the Attorney General in mind.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire in that particular whether the gentleman's committee, or any of the other committees, is taking up the question of revising the corrupt practices act, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in the Newberry case?

Mr. LUCE. The Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress has the problem under consideration, and I am commenting upon it in view of the fact that perhaps a few minutes may now be taken without injury to the work of the House, in order to urge gentlemen to be centering their thoughts upon what ought to be done—whether the act should be revived in the matter of the limitation of expenditure upon elections, whether there ought to be an attempt by constitutional amendment or otherwise to restore the vitality of the act in relation to primaries, and—in my judgment of more importance—whether in taking up the problem once more we should, in the light of the circumstances that led to the Supreme Court decision, consider putting teeth into the law and having it meet what many people in the country think is an evident need.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Following the suggestion of the gentleman that now is a good time to have the House center its thoughts on certain matters, I want to remind the gentleman that now might be a good time to remind the House that the Supreme Court at least still recognizes that there is such a thing as a Constitution.

Mr. LUCE. That, of course, gratifies us all. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. I hope my friend will still be gratified by the reminder when we consider the next bill under the call of the House.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention on this occasion to argue at all as to what ought to be done in the matter of the corrupt practices act, but simply to emphasize the fact that the circumstances—pardon my repetition, I make it because I deem the subject of much consequence—simply to emphasize the fact that the circumstances which have led up to the invalidating of at least some part of the act have evidently awakened a public interest in the matter which would warrant us in treating it as one of the issues to which our attention might usefully be directed.

Unless some gentleman desires to discuss the particular problem before us at the moment, I shall move the previous question. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE], a member of the committee.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I simply desire to call your attention to the fact that when we do put a new law on the statute books we should provide in that law a penalty for friends of a candidate going out and, whether known or unknown to him, expending $150,000 or more on his behalf. [Applause.] We should provide in that law—and I have introduced a bill and we have already had a hearing on it—that if any man expends a certain amount of money on behalf of a candidate, that he shall be compelled under penalty to report such expenditure before election. Every Member of this House and the Senate is opposed to a rich man buying a seat in Congress. [Applause.] But we must give every man a chance in his election. One way to do it—and that is the intent of all these election laws—is to give publicity to expenditures and means of obtaining votes. That publicity must be before election as well as after. We have seen the case of a man who has been convicted of a crime of conspiracy against section 8 of the corrupt practices act in spending a huge amount of money for election and the case reversed by the Supreme Court, which said that primary elections were not in existence at the time the Constitution went into force, and therefore the Constitution did not give Congress the right to legislate as to primary elections. We should provide immediately some kind of a law that will protect an honest man in his campaign for a seat in the Congress. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). The question is on the first resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Henry T. Rainey was not elected a Representative in this Congress from the twentieth congressional district of the State of Illinois and is not entitled to a seat herein.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Guy L. Shaw was duly elected a Representative in this Congress from the twentieth congressional district of the State of Illinois and is entitled to retain a seat herein.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LUCE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 205. An act relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 8744. An act granting the consent of Congress to the State of North Dakota, the county of Cass and the city of Fargo, N. Dak., and the State of Minnesota, the county of Clay and the city of Moorhead, Minn., or any of them, to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North between the cities of Fargo, N. Dak., and Moorhead, Minn., and for other purposes; and

H. R. 9237. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2108. An act prohibiting the interment of the body of any person in the cemetery known as the Cemetery of White's Tabernacle, No. 39, of the Ancient United Order of Sons and Daughters, Bretliren and Sisters of Moses, in the District of Columbia.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 9237. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and prior fiscal years, supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and subsequent fiscal years, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Friday, December 16, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

421. A letter from the Assistant Secretary of Labor, transmitting statement of the number of publications issued during the fiscal year 1921, the number distributed, the cost of paper used for such publications, the cost of printing, and the cost of preparation; to the Committee on Printing.

422. A letter from the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives, transmitting list of property belonging to the United States and under his charge as Doorkeeper, in the various rooms of the House in the Capitol Building and folding room in the House Office Building, as of December 5, 1921; to the Committee on Accounts.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. PARKER of New York, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2591) to provide for the construction of a public bridge across the Niagara River, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 513), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GOULD, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 99) providing a site upon public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., for the erection of a statue of Dante, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 514); which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 43) to grant authority to continue the use of the temporary buildings of the American Red Cross headquarters in the city of Washington, D. C., reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 515), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 108) authorizing the erection on public grounds in the city of Washington, D. C., of a memorial to Jeanne d'Arc, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 516), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 221) directing the Secretary of War to furnish clothing to ex-service men while patients in Public Health Service hospitals, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 517), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9508) granting an increase of pension to Elmer E. Frederick, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

3322. By Mr. TIMBERLAKE: Petition of W. C. Wiles and other adult residents of Boulder, Colo., protesting against the passage of House bill 4388, the compulsory Sunday observance bill; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, December 16, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we realize that in Thee we live, move, and have our being, and turn toward life and its duties with the consciousness of Thy help, so that when the burdens increase or the confusion and restlessness of life press most heavily upon us we may bravely turn to the responsibilities and feel that somehow Divine aid is granted unto us. So may we live that Thy own honor and Thy will shall be subserved by us. We ask in Jesus Christ's name. Amen.

LEBARON B. COLT, a Senator from the State of Rhode Island, appeared in his seat to-day.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by the Topeka (Kans.) Chapter of the Military Sisterhood, commending the President for calling the Limitation of Armament Conference and favoring the removal of unnecessary armament burdens and the prevention of war among the nations, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the James Shields Post, No. 57, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic, of Wellington, Kans., favoring the enactment of the so-called Morgan bill, increasing pensions for Civil War veterans to $72 per month and their widows to $50 per month, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FERNALD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment:

H. R. 5700. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old Subtreasury property at San Francisco, Calif.; and

H. R. 8401. An act to transfer the custody and control of the United States customhouse wharf at Charleston, S. C., from the Treasury Department to the War Department.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 423) for the relief of Hans P. Guttormsen, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 364) thereon.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED.

Mr. SUTHERLAND, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on December 15, 1921, they presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 2108) prohibiting the interment of the body of any person in the cemetery known as the Cemetery of White's Tabernacle No. 39 of the Ancient United Order of Sons and Daughters, Brethren and Sisters of Moses, in the District of Columbia.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred, as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 2875) to confer jurisdiction upon the insular courts of Porto Rico to enforce the national prohibition act and the act supplemental thereto; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LENROOT:

A bill (S. 2876) for the relief of the Philippine Scouts; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2877) for the relief of Frank Murray; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 2878) to allocate the control, administration, and supervision of all functions of the Government principally affecting agriculture, forestry, and food to the Department of Agriculture; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 2879) granting a pension to Lucy Ord Mason; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 2880) granting an increase of pension to Thomas M. Woods (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NORRIS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 146) authorizing the President to extend invitations to foreign Governments to send delegates to a world's dairy congress in 1923; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

UNITED STATES JUDGES.

Mr. BURSUM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

LOANS TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I submit the following resolution, which I ask may be read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 195), as follows:

Whereas the payment of the financial obligations owing by foreign Governments to the United States as a result of the war with Germany directly involves matters of utmost national and international importance; and

Whereas Governments and individuals will be materially assisted in the ultimate solution of the many problems confronting them growing out of and related to the payment of such obligations by an expression of the policy of the Senate of the United States of America in relation to such payments: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is hereby declared to be the sense of the Senate that the Government of the United States will be unable to agree to or accept the cancellation or discharge of such obligations, or any part of them, without payment.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution may lie on the table. I merely have this to say with reference to it: There has been much discussion and a number of statements in the newspapers with regard to the United States canceling the indebtedness owing us from foreign Governments. I grew up in a part of the country devastated by war, and I sympathize with the people of those foreign countries in the condition in which they find themselves, but the people of this country are not going to consent to those debts being canceled, and I think the sooner those who owe us this money understand that we are not going to cancel those debts or any part of them, the better it will be for those countries. That is the reason why I desire to get the Senate to go on record with reference to the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table.

ISSUANCE OF CHECKS, ETC., IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Chair lay before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1033) regulating the issuance of checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money within the District of Columbia, and I move that the Senate request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, let the request be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware asks unanimous consent that the amendments of the House of Representatives to Senate bill 1033 be laid before the Senate, and also moves that the Senate disagree to the amendments proposed by the House and request a conference.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall make no objection to the request, because I believe it is the only way in which the bill may be put in a position or condition where it may be properly passed or disposed of by the Senate. So far as the House amendments are concerned, I do not understand that there is objection to them, but the parliamentary situation is such that it will be necessary to have the bill go to conference before the matter may be cleared up and the bill modified so as to meet with the approval of Senators.

Mr. FLETCHER. The amendments of the House are on the table, and if taken up by unanimous consent, the question will be whether the Senate shall concur or decline to concur in the amendments. That is the situation, as I understand it.

Mr. ROBINSON. May I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the request for unanimous consent to lay the amendments before the Senate was coupled with a motion for a conference.

Mr. FLETCHER. If we disagree to the House amendments, they will have to go to conference?

Mr. KING. That is the request.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1033) regulating the issuance of checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money within the District of Columbia; and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to disagree to the House amendments and request a conference.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. BALL, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. KING conferees on the part of the Senate.

CLAIMS FOR REIMBURSEMENT OF WAR LOSSES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, a detailed statement of the number of claims filed under the provisions of "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post offices and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes," together with a statement of the status of the work involved in connection with their adjudication, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

TRAVEL OF OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES, UNITED STATES VETERANS' BUREAU.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, transmitting, pursuant to law, a detailed statement showing what officers or employees (other than special agents or inspectors who in the discharge of their regular duties are required to travel constantly) have traveled on official business from Washington to points outside of the District of Columbia during the fiscal year, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REGULATION OF MARINE INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I understand that when the present unfinished business has been disposed of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] will move, in accordance with the notice he has given, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913. While I know that a notice does not give any special right in the matter, I desire to give notice that when that bill shall have been disposed of I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

I do not think there will be any serious opposition to the measure. It has been thrashed out and those interested have been satisfied, but it is rather a long bill and probably could not be disposed of by unanimous consent. It is rather an important measure, and I shall seek to have the bill taken up when the bill of which the junior Senator from Iowa has charge is disposed of.

TRADE WITH CHINA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4810) to authorize the incorporation of companies to promote trade in China.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Senator if he will not allow me to bring up for consideration, providing it does not involve any lengthy debate, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 79) authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic. I was not here last night when a similar measure, providing for reimbursement to the American Trading Co. for the importation of certain sugar, was passed, and therefore did not have an opportunity to move the consideration of this measure, which is practically similar in character. In view of the fact that the Senate favorably considered that measure, I ask the Senator if he will allow me to bring the joint resolution before the Senate now for a vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I asked that the trade with China bill be brought before the Senate at this moment largely to afford the Senator form Missouri [Mr. REED] an opportunity to continue the address which he began yesterday, knowing that if no question were pending before the Senate it would not be in order for the Senator to speak. I understand that the Senator from Missouri expects to occupy two hours or more in an address on the Limitation of Armament Conference and its work. I do not think that it would facilitate the consideration of the joint resolution to which the Senator from New Jersey refers if I were to withdraw my request.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not wish to interfere with any arrangements that have been made with regard to the continuation of any speech or the bringing before the Senate of the measure which the Senator from Iowa has in charge. I am compelled to be away next week, however, and I should like to have the Senate consider this joint resolution, which has been on the calendar for some time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am in just the same position. I expect to leave Washington very early next week, and I am exceedingly anxious to secure a vote upon the so-called China trade act; but I am sure we can accommodate the matter.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, possibly later during the day or to-morrow an opportunity will be offered to bring up the matter to which I have referred, and therefore I withhold any objection.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will do all I can to help the Senator from New Jersey bring before the Senate the joint resolution to which he refers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to taking up the unfinished business?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4810) to authorize the incorporation of companies to promote trade in China.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Sheppard
Ball	Gooding	McKellar	Smith
Bursum	Hale	McKinley	Spencer
Capper	Harris	McNary	Stanfield
Caraway	Harrison	Moses	Sterling
Colt	Heflin	Nelson	Swanson
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	New	Townsend
Cummins	Kellogg	Nicholson	Trammell
Curtis	Kendrick	Norbeck	Underwood
Dial	Kenyon	Overman	Wadsworth
du Pont	Keyes	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Ernst	King	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Fernald	Ladd	Poindexter	Warren
Fletcher	La Follette	Reed	Watson, Ga.
France	Lenroot	Robinson	Willis

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the following Senators are detained from the Senate in attendance upon a meeting of the Committee on Finance: The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER].

I also desire to announce that the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] is absent on business of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT AND FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. REED resumed and concluded the speech begun by him on yesterday. His speech entire is as follows:

Thursday, December 15, 1921.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to enlist, if possible, the attention of the Senate to the proposed quadruple alliance of 1921. Perhaps it might better be denominated the American-Anglo-Japanese alliance. This gold brick was finished one night at 11 o'clock in secret session and handed to the American people about daylight the next morning, evidently with the idea at that time that it could be sold quickly to an unsuspecting public.

A conference of the great nations was called, partially at least in response to a resolution of Congress, for the purpose of working out a plan of reduction of armaments. The request was made through that resolution of Congress that in so far as possible the negotiations should be conducted in public in order that the American people and all the world might understand what was being undertaken, and be made acquainted with the arguments and policies advanced by the various countries. The conference was assembled with a great flourish of trumpets. The stage was admirably set. No advertising manager of a moving picture or a circus ever conceived a better plan of publicity.

On the very day the conference was to assemble we were to celebrate armistice day and the body of the unknown soldier was paraded through the streets of Washington, of course to justly honor the dead. But singularly enough the opening of the Disarmament Conference was set for the identical time. The papers, of course, carried in parallel columns to the people of the United States the accounts of both events. The picture was drawn by the pens of wonderful writers, so that all the sentiments of the battle field, all the tender and loving thoughts of the American heart, all of the appeals of heroism, would be concentered around one thought, that here was meeting a great convention of nations having for its sole object the reduction of armament, the destruction of the implements of death, the abolition by peaceful negotiation of those deadly and fearsome appliances which men have made for their own destruction.

The assembly was called together in public. The Congress was invited. The Secretary of State, in opening the proceedings, suggested only a plan for the reduction of armaments. Little by little it later began to filter out that in secret conferences which had sprung up, consideration was being given to some kind of alliance. That every effort was made to keep the fact from the American public and the world can not be denied, for all the ingenuity of the masterly corps of writers who have attended this conference was unable to report to the American people any real and substantial information regarding this proposed quadruple alliance. All that we received were hints, suspicions, prognostications by shrewd men who were trying to see behind the scenes, but who were kept out by a curtain of secrecy as carefully drawn as ever were the barred shutters of a chamber in which the plottings of kings for the partitioning of the earth have taken place.

Senators and Representatives who heard of these suspicions hesitated to speak of them, because we have all appreciated the fact that delicacy should be observed in discussing questions pending their negotiation. But, Mr. President, I am determined to now express my views regarding this treaty. For so doing I have many reasons, among others is the fact that a few months ago we were told that because negotiations had been allowed to proceed with reference to another treaty, and because the President at that time had made certain declarations and they had not been opposed upon the floor of Congress, we were thereby estopped and in honor could not refuse to abide by declarations that had been publicly made to the world.

So far as I am concerned, therefore, I propose now briefly to state my views with reference to this treaty. At the outset let me say that I believe every man in this Chamber, every man in the House of Representatives, and the entire American public, without exception, would welcome with delight the working out of a plan of general reduction of armaments, so that some of the burdens of taxation might be removed from the shoulders of the people of our country and of the peoples of the world. To the happy consummation of such a project we are ready to give our united support. We all long for the day when the substance of the people of the world will not be consumed in preparations for war, and when the race in the creation of armaments shall have ceased. To the realization of such a hope we are all devoted.

But, Mr. President, the reduction of the number of ships of the United States Navy and a corresponding reduction in the number of ships of the navies of the other nations of the world has no proper relation to an American-Anglo Franco-Japanese alliance. The plain truth is that an attempt is being forced to make the proposition of reduction of armaments the pack horse upon whose sagging back shall be loaded a quadruple alliance made for the protection of the interests of Japan and Great Britain in the Orient, to compel the United States of America to underwrite, in the blood of its sons, the ambition and avarice of Great Britain and Japan in the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. President, let us make a brief survey of America's position as it is to-day, as it always has been, and, God willing, as it always shall be. Abraham Lincoln in his first great patriotic speech delivered at Springfield, Ill., on January 27, 1837, said this:

> All the armies of Europe and Asia and Africa combined, with all the treasure of the earth in their military chests, with a Bonaparte for a commander, could not by force take a drink from the Ohio or make a track on the Blue Ridge in a trial of a thousand years.

Thus spoke the American of the past generation; thus spoke Abraham Lincoln, whom I regard in many respects as the greatest man and the greatest patriot who ever lived for his country and died in her cause.

In 1837, when Lincoln uttered those words, the United States had a population of 15,000,000; in 1860, when we entered the war between the States, we had but 31,000,000 people; to-day we have 110,000,000. Then we were a poor people, a debtor Nation, with undeveloped industries, with a trackless forest yet to be conquered. Nearly all of the vast area west of the Ohio River was almost terra incognita. To-day every fertile acre of land between the two oceans is under cultivation. Cities have arisen as by magic. Gigantic factories produce more than the population can use and have a mighty surplus to be shipped abroad.

In the last war we demonstrated that we could feed the world, and, if it had been necessary, we could have demonstrated that we could have conquered the world. At least I can say in all modesty that we could have stood upon our seagirt shores and hurled back into the bloody tide the body of every invader though the united armies of the earth had come against us.

We are to-day so situated, as creditor nation to the world, that in a race for naval or military supremacy we can unquestionably eclipse all other powers. We could use the interest on our foreign loans, if it is ever paid, and with it alone build a navy faster than any other nation of the world.

We have the opportunity to become the master of the seas. Any other Government but ours would embrace the opportunity. We alone of all the nations of the world have pursued a wholly unselfish policy. We have proclaimed by our example and our history and reaffirm to-day that what we have and which we justly acquired in every foot we will maintain, but that we will enter upon no buccaneering expeditions to ravish other peoples' lands or goods. We have no ambition to gratify, no imperialistic impulse to glut. We stay at home and attend to our own business. We have no subject peoples; we have forged no chains, riveted no fetters, imposed no slavery, civil or religious, upon any people of the earth. So living, blessed by God and by nature, and wisely guided by the prescience of our forefathers, desiring nothing except to work out our own salvation and fulfill our own destiny, we are content. Possessing the power to become master of the ocean and to impose our will upon other peoples, we have no desire to exercise that power. Our only wish is that we shall forever remain a sovereign State. We are willing that all other peoples shall enjoy the privilege we claim for ourselves. Animated by these motives we invited certain of the great nations to come in council and to work out plans for the reduction of armaments. We were willing to waive the opportunity to become master of the ocean and to take our place merely as one of the powers upon the ocean.

In the pursuit of that thought the Secretary of State submitted a plan which insures to Great Britain absolute supremacy on the seas for 10 years. Mark you, the Hughes plan takes from us by solemn treaty the right to make ourselves the equal of the British Empire upon the seas until 10 years have elapsed. The stipulations of the treaty are explicit. We can not until the end of 10 years have a fleet equal to that of Great Britain. That is a dangerous concession; certainly one which goes to the entire limit of prudence. In 10 years' time empires may be dissolved, nations may be destroyed, and the face of the world completely changed.

Furthermore, while this arrangement may be terminated at the end of 10 years, it is intended to be permanent in its nature, because the proportion of armament is not worked out until the end of 10 years, and if the plan were to be then discontinued there would be but little use in entering upon the arrangement.

The plan further contemplates that there shall be conceded to Japan a navy entirely out of proportion to her wealth or to her population when measured by the wealth and population of either Great Britain or the United States. Japan is allowed three-fifths as many vessels as the United States. She has half our population; she has probably one-tenth or one-twentieth of our wealth; yet she is permitted to maintain three vessels to our five.

Friday, December 16, 1921.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, on yesterday I called attention to the fact that if we enter into this proposed treaty we shall solemnly bind ourselves for 10 years to a plan which during the entire 10 years will permit Great Britain to retain her supremacy upon the seas and to the important consideration that we shall not be allowed during that entire period to increase our naval armament, though we may find ourselves in the greatest peril.

I also called attention to the fact that Japan will be allowed to maintain three vessels against our five, and I challenged attention to the circumstance that the proportion of Japan's sea armament to that allowed the United States is out of all harmony with the ratio of the two countries' populations and resources.

I have thus far been speaking merely of the number of ships and weight of metal accorded the respective nations. It is important, however, that I should add that, as I am informed, naval experts can demonstrate that in fact the power of the ships allowed the United States, when correctly tabulated, is far below the proportions of 5-5-3. Moreover and by way of parenthesis, it appears from press reports that an agreement has already been made whereby Japan shall retain her most modern and best fighting ship, and one which, if I am not misinformed, has a distinct advantage over any ship of the American Navy, if, indeed, it does not have an advantage over any ship afloat or which is being designed.

This is only another evidence of the fact that the occidental mind is no match for oriental skill in diplomatic proceedings. From the beginning of the European war down to the present moment Japan has demonstrated her superiority over American and European statesmen. With the loss from the war of practically nothing in money and with a loss, I think, of less than a thousand men in the war, she took of the spoils of that war more than any other nation except Great Britain. She seized and holds the keys of the Pacific in so far as those keys relate to the doors of China and the Far East. Before her to-day our statesmen bend and yield to her not only an unfair proportion of the ships but, at her insistent demand, allow her to keep a floating arsenal with a greater speed and gun power than any vessel in the American Navy.

But, Mr. President, he who estimates the power of a navy merely by the number of ships and the weight of metal proves himself the veriest of amateurs. As important as ships and guns are naval bases, enabling a fleet to seek security from pursuers beneath the guns of their own fortresses and to obtain supplies at convenient points, and thus continue operations. In that connection I desire to call attention to the fact that America has but few naval bases, while her great rivals upon the ocean are equipped to such an extent that the possession of practically one-half of the fleet of the United States would give them an overmastering advantage in every conflict taking place at a considerable distance from our shores. Japan has not overlooked this fact; England has not overlooked it; they are awake. Every foot of land they could seize has been seized, and, as I shall show, by this instrument which we are asked to ratify we confirm them in their title and agree to defend them in their possession.

Now, briefly to lay the groundwork for deductions to be made hereafter, I desire to call the roll of the principal naval bases of Great Britain, some of them in the Atlantic, it is true, and some of them in the Pacific, but there will never be a war in the Pacific that does not extend to the Atlantic. The principal naval bases of the British Empire are:

Chatham, Liverpool, Plymouth, Portsmouth, Rosyth, in the British Isles; Calcutta, India; Singapore, Straits Settlement, Hongkong, China; Malta and Gibraltar, in the Mediterranean; Melbourne and Sydney, Australia; Hamilton, Bermuda; Halifax, Esquimault, and Victoria, in Canada.

Other bases of equal importance, if not so well protected, are—

Queenstown, Dover, and Pembroke, in the British Isles; Aden, Bombay, Madras, Rangoon, Karachi, India; Freemantle, Perth, Hobart, Brisbane, in Australia; St. Georges, Bermuda; Charlottetown, Montreal, Quebec, St. Johns, New Brunswick, Canada; Colombo, Ceylon; Weihaiwei, China; Jamaica, West Indies; Mauritius, Zanzibar, and Dar-es-Salaam, in the Indian Ocean; St. Johns, Newfoundland; Freetown, Sierra Leone, Capetown, South Africa; and Auckland, New Zealand.

The totals are 15 main naval bases and 28 of slightly less importance. Naturally there are many other British ports that could be easily converted into bases.

The digest which I have read was furnished me by Mr. Schreiner, a student of international affairs. In connection with it, and in so far as our own coast is concerned, I can not refrain from challenging attention to the fact that Great Britain holds the Bahamas, only a few miles from our coast, commanding trade routes, and furnishing a point of immediate attack by airplane or submarine upon the coast of America In like manner Trinidad is the key to the south; but, in addition to this, she holds command of a vast group of islands which form the segment of a circle embracing the easterly end of the Panama Canal. These islands, Mr. President, are almost innumerable. The spots upon the map of the West Indies which I have here, some of them almost invisible, are all controlled by Great Britain, with the exception of a few controlled by France.

I shall not take the time to-day to enlarge upon this question. Its importance is demonstrated by the fact that we have only recently purchased at great cost from Denmark the Virgin Islands. We were told that they commanded the mouth of the canal; we were informed that they were essential to its defense; and yet the Virgin Islands are completely surrounded by the possessions of Great Britain. That fact can not be ignored. If those islands were of critical and vast importance, and if they alone menaced the canal, it can not be denied that by the fortification and control of this vast group of islands, forming a complete segment of a circle, shutting the Gulf and closing the waters of the Caribbean Sea, Great Britain could, if she saw fit, command absolutely our entrance to and exit from the canal.

One of these islands is within 48 miles of the Florida coast. Naval experts agree that in case of a war with a first-rate power the capture of the Florida coast by that power is more important from a strategic standpoint than would be the capture of New York City.

You ask me what this has to do with the question under consideration. I reply that, to borrow the phrase of another, applied elsewhere, the canal is the jugular vein of America. Any war we may have with any great naval power will not be confined to either the Atlantic or the Pacific Ocean.

It will extend over all the seas, and both our coasts must be defended. In such a controversy as that it is absolutely essential that we should hold a complete control of the canal, so that our vessels might pass back and forth, the Atlantic and the Pacific Fleets supplementing each other in order to come to America's defense.

But, Mr. President, when we turn to the Pacific Ocean we find that in that terrftory Japan and Great Britain now, under the new arrangement, hold an absolute dominance. To begin with, Japan has fortifications on many of her islands. I have here a complete list of them.

The principal coast defenses of Japan are the following:

Tokyo Bay, which includes the defenses of the naval station at Yokosuka.
Shimonoseki, which guards the western entrance to the Sea of Japan.
Hakodate.
Yura Strait, which guards the approach to Osaka.
Hiroshima, which guards the approaches to the Kure Naval Station.

Kii Channel, which guards the entrance to the Inland Sea between Honshu and Shikoku.
Bungo Channel, which guards the entrance to the Inland Sea between Shikoku and Kyushu.
Maizuru Naval Station.
Tsushima (Takeshiki Naval Station).
Sasebo Naval Station.
Nagasaki.
Shinkai Naval Station, Korea.
Port Arthur.
Keelung, Formosa.
Pescadores (Bako Naval Station), between Formosa and China.
Port Lloyd, Bonin Islands (being built or increased).
Prohibited areas established at Amami-O-Shima, Loochoo Islands, recently, which probably means the establishment of fortifications in these islands.

This document was furnished to me by a man who knows what he is talking about.

Mr. President, that is not all that there is to be said about bases and fortifications. The whole system of warfare has been revolutionized in the last few years. Formerly, although generally regarded as a great handicap, great naval guns could be trained upon fortresses, and frequently silence the fortress. Therefore great and expensive fortifications were created; but in modern times it has been discovered that a navy is absolutely helpless against a single first-class land battery.

I call attention, without stopping to go into details, to the fact that in the Dardanelles, in the late war, 18 great British men-of-war, headed by a superdreadnaught, for many hours undertook to silence the Turkish guns, composed of a battery that had been emplaced in less than two weeks' time. At the end of that fight the Turkish batteries were unharmed and the great British fleet, supplemented by a French vessel or two, was driven from those waters. It therefore follows that wherever a country has an island lying anywhere near a trade route, or has an island anywhere which it is necessary to resort to for the protection of ships, the planting there of a few guns will make it a place of refuge for every vessel of that country, and will make it impregnable against assault. These islands, therefore, can not only be used as places to which hard-pressed vessels can take refuge in security, but in addition to that they can be and will be the coaling and outfitting stations to which war vessels may resort, and thus keep indefinitely on the waters of the ocean.

Now let me call your attention to these islands of the Pacific. They have been described in beautiful and poetic language by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

I think we ought to read this often; it is so much like a poem and so little like statesmanship. Senator LODGE said:

> History unhappily has shown that there is no corner of the earth so remote or so valueless that it is not capable of giving cause for controversy or even for war between the tribes and the nations of mankind. But the islands of the Pacific, although remote from the dwelling places of the mass of humanity, are far from valueless.
> The islands of the southwestern Pacific extend over a vast space in that great ocean. They reach from the Marquesas on the east to the Philippines on the west; from the Aleutian Islands on the north nearly to the Antarctic Circle on the south. They are far more numerous than is generally realized. I do not know what the total number is, but I am informed as to the Philippines, and it appears that this group alone contains over 3,100 islands, of which 1,600 have names. We have all probably heard of the remark of Robert Louis Stevenson, when on leaving one of the Pacific Islands he was asked how he was going to Samoa. He replied that he should just go out and turn to the left. These islands are, comparatively speaking, so dense that we might describe them in the words of Browning as the—
> Sprinkled isles,
> Lily on lily that o'erlace the sea—
> And yet the region through which they are scattered is so vast that the isles of Greece and the Aegean Sea, so famous in history and in poetry, could easily be lost therein and continue unnoticed except by wandering seamen or stray adventurers. They range from Australia, continental in magnitude, to atolls where there are no dwellers but the builders of the coral reefs, or lonely rocks marking the peaks of mountains which rise up from the ocean's floor through miles of water before they touch the air—and breathe. He did not say "and breathe," but I take it that is what they came up for. I had thought to omit the next, but I will read it, it is so pretty. It reminds me of a mother's blandishments to her baby when she is about to administer a dose of castor oil. How sweet it sounds. It is almost as entrancing as a hand organ heard beneath the window of a hospital's operating room. [Laughter.]

> To the western and eastern world alike most of the islands of the southwestern Pacific are little known. There still lingers about them the charm so compelling and so fascinating which an undiscovered country has for the sons of men who are weary of main-traveled roads and the trampled highways of trade and commerce which cover the surface of the present earth.
> Upon these islands still shines the glamor of romance in the stories of Melville and the writings of Robert Louis Stevenson, to whom the South Seas gave both a grave and a monument imperishable as his own fame. But the Pacific islands are much more than this. They possess certain qualities other than natural beauty and romantic charm, which to many minds are more enticing. The larger ones are rich in many ways, fertile in the gifts of soil and climate and in other forms of riches desired by men, which extend from the untold mineral resources of Australia to the pearls which are brought from the depths of the ocean. There are among them all great areas of forest and of plain fit for the support and prosperity of civilized man. In a word, they have a very great material value, largely undeveloped; and where this condition exists the desires of men will enter, and conflicting human desires have throughout recorded history been breeders of war.
> Thus far the wastes of the Pacific Ocean, with all the crowding islands, except on the edges of the continents, have not been the scene of great wars; and yet not many years have passed since three great nations sent their warships to Samoa because there was a dispute in regard to those distant islands. Therefore, an agreement among the nations controlling these islands has a very serious importance to the peace of the world.

Beautiful picture! "Lily on lily that o'erlace the sea"! But he forgot to tell us that the Union Jack of England, the tricolor of France, or the red-disked banner of the Mikado floats over all save a few of them, which, outside of the Philippines, can be counted on the fingers of the hand. He forgot to mention that by the treaty made with Germany there were turned over to Japan the Marshall and Caroline groups, which form impregnable belts between the United States and her Philippine possessions, the possession of which brings Japan's base of operation 2,000 miles nearer the American coast than it ever was before. This would compel us to run the gantlet of Japanese guns in case there should ever be a controversy and the Philippines should be seized. He also forgot to relate that these islands, turned over to and now claimed by Japan, give to Japan an almost perfect command of the Chinese coast, and amount to fortifications erected between the United States and Japan as well as between the United States and our Philippine possessions.

We have heard much talk of the island of Yap, and one would think the island of Yap was the most important point in the Pacific Ocean. It is only one of the little petals of the "lily on lily that o'erlace the sea." In the vast circle of the Pacific it is about equivalent to a diminutive and microscopic fly speck on the face of a large plate-glass window. It is one of hundreds, if not thousands, of islands dealt with by the Versailles treaty, and which we now by this instrument, no matter how much quibbling there may be about it, confirm forever to Japan.

There will be a lot of quibbling about this treaty. Indeed, reservations to it have already appeared. If the Senate does its duty, before it gets through with this treaty it will write a reservation that will strike it all out except merely a friendly proffer.

In connection with the remarks of Senator LODGE I can not refrain from reading an excerpt from an article by H. L. Mencken. He states, ironically:

> An imagination approaching the frenetic in virulence is needed to see anything more than an amiable politeness in the four-power treaty so painfully concocted by the great statesmen assembled at Washington. Even Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, in his speech launching it upon the world, was very cautious about describing its practical effects. Instead of going into that important matter frankly and fully, he devoted at least half of his time to a lyrical account of human happiness in the South Seas—an account obviously based upon a diligent reading of Frederick O'Brien's celebrated book, and particularly upon an examination of the illustrations thereof, with their intimate views of exquisite scenery, both geographical and anatomical. At least one other Senator confesses that he was moved profoundly by his learned colleague's eloquence. Ah, to be young again and free to roam this lovely earth—
> Eating huckleberries all day long,
> And learning how to love!

[Laughter.]

Mr. President, a smile is a good thing at any time, but, after all, this is no laughing matter. This treaty is a solemn convention which will bind us irrevocably for 10 years. We can not withdraw during that time unless we break faith. At the end of that period we will have the option of withdrawing.

Upon the other side of this Chamber, occupying at the time seats now almost vacant, sat gentlemen who denounced the League of Nations covenant as impossible because it did not provide a means by which we could withdraw at will. I am wondering if those gentlemen are now willing to enter into a compact which would bind us irrevocably for 10 long years of time, a treaty that contains no condition whatever permitting us to increase our sea armament, even though we might be menaced in the most serious way.

Ten years is a long time in the life of a nation. An hour is sometimes filled with a nation's fate. But 10 years of ordinary time in the life of a nation is longer, as events now transpire, than a century would have been under the conditions of two centuries ago. What lies within the womb of the immediate future? Who shall answer, save he be a fool, willing to risk his prophecy as against the culmination of events?

Sir, there lies a Russia. What is to be her destiny? Will she emerge formed into a dozen contending States? Will she come forth a great and imperial domain, controlled, as in the past, by a ruling class? Or will she be set upon and divided by her rapacious enemies, and in such a division as that how much would Japan claim? Japanese soldiers are already on the mainland, and if Russia should ever rise to expel them, war upon the islands held by Japan would be the first necessary blow. In such a war, under this treaty, as I shall show later on, we would be obligated to stand with Japan against Russia, a country which has never fired a hostile gun at the American Nation and has been our friend through the century and a third of our existence.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, would it interrupt the Senator if I should make a suggestion at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. I desire to invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that the policy of the United States under the Wilson administration—and, so far as I know, it is the policy of the present administration—was to preserve the territorial integrity of Russia, and therefore Mr. Wilson and the State Department discouraged any attempt to dismember Russia or to foment strife within which would culminate in the segregation of any territory and the organization of the same into a separate State.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. I was pursuing the theme of the possibilities of the future. What is to come?

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. FRANCE. I would like to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Utah and I have already had some controversy upon that very point in the course of a public debate. I call attention to the fact that while the Wilson administration did once protest against the dismemberment of Russia, Russia was dismembered by the allied policy and at the peace conference by the action of the conferees there, as was very clearly brought out in the book of Mr. Dillon, "The Inside Story of the Peace Conference." He called attention to the fact that territory was disannexed from Russia as a result of the policy of the Allies, particularly at Paris.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator; and in a few moments I shall prove that this treaty ties us into the League of Nations.

Mr. FRANCE. I should have stated that territory was disannexed from Russia as a result of allied policy and at the peace conference, instead of speaking of Russia as being dismembered.

Mr. REED. I understand what took place. Allow me to proceed with my theme. I do not wish to get this debate into the question of what ex-President Wilson did or of what President Harding is doing. I sincerely desire to put it upon the broad ground of our national safety and our national policy.

I said that this treaty ties us into the league. I wish to make that statement clear. Our associates are tied in the league, subject to the orders of the league, and we therefore can be affected by its decrees through this treaty, although we have no part or voice in the proceedings of the league. That I shall discuss presently.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely desire to ask, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him for that purpose, that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] tell us what portion of Russia was disannexed by the Versailles treaty.

Mr. FRANCE. I was referring to territory which was disannexed by allied policy and which was a part of the Russian dominion prior to the war.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What part?

Mr. FRANCE. That territory which composed Poland, which is now an independent power, Latvia, Lithuania, Esthonia, and Finland, also now independent.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Those are the territories to which the Senator refers?

Mr. FRANCE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Are we to understand the Senator from Maryland disapproves of the dismemberment of Poland as a part of Russia?

Mr. FRANCE. I will say in answer to the question of the Senator that I was not expressing either approbation or disapprobation. I was merely calling attention to the historical fact.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand perfectly well, but I wanted to get an expression from the Senator on that subject if he would be willing to venture one.

Mr. FRANCE. I dislike to discuss so large a question in the time of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well; I do not press it.

Mr. FRANCE. It is rather a large question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire, if I can, to keep this question free from all complications and to discuss it by itself. I referred to the League of Nations only because it furnishes an example of the attitude of Senators on the other side of the Chamber and some Senators upon this side. I particularly call attention again to the fact that there was scarcely a Senator upon the other side of the Chamber who did not denounce the provision in the original draft of the League of Nations because it afforded a way for us to go in but did not provide a means for us to get out. Because of that universal protest the clause was inserted allowing us to withdraw after two years' notice. That was again denounced upon the other side of the Chamber as insufficient; but it is now proposed to submit to the Senate a treaty which binds us irrevocably, I repeat, for a period of 10 years.

I was discussing the theme of what might happen at this time. I have referred to Russia. What of all the new States that have been created? What of the conflict now burning between Great Britain and France and Germany in regard to Silesia, in regard to all the other questions that are wrapped up in the aftermath, if you please, of the Great War? What will be the condition in 10 years from now? No living man can say with any certainty that Germany and Russia may not be in an alliance or coalition. He can not state what conflict may arise between Japan and Russia growing out of the complications which may arise.

What of China? There she lies, evidently awakening from the slumber of centuries. The most wholesome thing I know of China is that her people are in a condition of practical revolt. They are filled with dissatisfaction. They are struggling to find a way out. If the 300,000,000 Chinamen shall find themselves, who dares to say that they will permit Japan to keep her hand upon the Chinese throat—and the man who denies that that hand is there to-day and the clutch constantly tightening is a man who is not informed or who is not candid. What lies within the next 10 years? No man, I repeat, can tell.

Now, Mr. President, I proceed to a discussion of the terms of this instrument; but as a preliminary, let me observe that there is absolutely no use in discussing the terms of any instrument with any man who will not be candid. If men desire to see an instrument in a certain light and are determined for partisan or other reasons to so regard it, there is but little use in talking to such men. I affirm that the meaning of this instrument is so plain upon its face that there is no room for two opinions as to its meaning.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another interruption?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. For the purpose of getting history straight, I desire to remark that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE], if he so said, and I understood him to say so, is in error in the statement that either Latvia or Lithuania was separated from Russia by the Versailles treaty or by any act of the Government of the United States or any representative of the Government of the United States. Neither Latvia nor Lithuania was referred to in the treaty of Versailles. They each established their independence by independent action against Russia, and their independence has been recognized by the government of that country, so far as it has a government.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I have come into the Chamber since the Senator began speaking. He has been discussing the treaty, and I do not know to what subject he has devoted himself. I understand he is now proposing to discuss the terms of the treaty?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Preliminary to that is the authority to make the treaty. Has the Senator discussed that?

Mr. REED. I have not.

Mr. SHIELDS. I wish the Senator would address himself to that question before he has concluded. If these parties have no authority to deal absolutely with each other, the terms amount to little. The Senator should remember that under the League of Nations three of these powers are subject nations.

Mr. REED. I intend to discuss that.

Mr. SHIELDS. They owe allegiance to the supergovernment created by the League of Nations of which they are members. This treaty can not, in the language of the Versailles treaty, or rather the league, be binding until it is filed with the secretary of the League of Nations and published. Their Governments have nothing to do but with the finality of making it binding.

Secondly, and more important, which is final, there is a conflict of jurisdiction. This treaty provides for a meeting of the representatives of the four nations to settle matters. Under the League of Nations it is provided that these same matters shall be settled by the council and by the assembly. There is such a vital conflict of jurisdiction that these subject nations—Great Britain, Japan, and France—must secede from the League of Nations before they can bind themselves to us. We are standing here in a bad attitude. We can bind ourselves. They, as subject nations, can not do it, but are subject to the League of Nations and must obey in every controversy what the league decides they shall do.

Mr. REED. I am obliged to the Senator. It is a theme I expect to dwell upon, but he has stated it so well that I may not be obliged to take the time of the Senate to discuss it further than perhaps call attention to the specific language of the compacts these nations have made.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit a further interruption——

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If I understand the argument of the Senator from Tennessee quite correctly, we never, now or hereafter, can make a treaty on any subject with any nation being a member of the League of Nations.

Mr. SHIELDS. Oh, no; the Senator has no right to place any such construction upon my statement. These other nations can not make a treaty with us without the consent of the league.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What am I to understand? The Senator calls attention to the fact that the treaty must be recorded.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And therefore they are restricted in their power to make a treaty. That provision applies to every treaty, and accordingly we can make no treaty whatever.

Mr. SHIELDS. As members of the league, they must first file the treaty there and then it must be published. Until then, if they keep their word with the League of Nations, they are powerless to make and perform a treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SHIELDS. They are subject nations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SHIELDS. They owe their allegiance to the supergovernment created by the League of Nations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand the Senator correctly, but they can not make a treaty.

Mr. SHIELDS. Of course not, any more than a State of this Union could under the Constitution make a separate treaty with a foreign Government.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am appealing to Senators to bring to this question the rules of construction applicable to treaties.

The language employed in treaties is not the language which is employed between individuals. Phrases have a peculiar meaning. No nation preparing to form an offensive alliance has ever written into the treaty that it is forming such alliance for the purpose of destroying or making war on some other nation. The universal language of such a treaty is that the nations are joined together for the purpose of preserving the peace, for the purpose of mutual protection, for the purpose of saving themselves or the world from destruction. Whenever the agreement is made that they will stand by each other, there is but one construction placed upon that kind of proposition, when it comes to a practical test, and that is that they shall make war side by side. It has been true in every period of history. I wish merely to show Senators how ancient it is. Here is a treaty made between Rome and the 30 Latin cities 492 years before Christ, and the opening clause provides:

> There shall be peace between the Romans and all the Latin cities so long as the heavens and the earth shall remain in the same position.
> They shall not make war nor cause war to be made against each other, nor permit each other's enemies to pass through their respective territories.

And yet the practical construction of that treaty was that they were allies in defense and allies in attack, until the mountains and the valleys of Italy were drenched with gore.

Again, 418 years before Christ, the Argives and the Lacedaemonians made a treaty of peace and of arbitration, for arbitration is nothing new. I read:

> It seems good to the Lacedaemonians and to the Argives to make peace and alliance for 50 years on the following conditions:
> (1) They shall submit to arbitration on fair and equal terms according to their ancestral customs.

So, long ago, in the centuries which have passed, in this treaty, which was made nearly 500 years before Christ, one finds in part the language of this present instrument in substance and effect. Mark you, the present treaty provides that in case of a menace or attack we shall consult together with our new allies, the three other members of this quadruple alliance, with reference to the best means of defense. How ancient that is! This treaty continues:

> (4) If it shall be necessary to make an expedition in common against any place, the Lacedaemonians and Argives shall consult together and fix the share in the war which may be equitably borne by the allies.

Again, 220 years before Christ, Byzantium and Prusias, king of Bythnia and Rhodes, made a treaty which recited:

> There shall be peace and amity forever between Prusias and the Byzantines.

That treaty, if I recollect my history aright, eventuated in the two nations standing together in war.

One hundred and seventy-nine before Christ Pharnaces, Eumenes, and Ariarthes made a treaty of defense against Roman supremacy, and it contained a clause which is singularly like a clause in the treaty which I am now considering and which provides for the cancellation of the Japanese and English alliance. More than 2,000 years ago it was provided that—

> Such treaties as exist between Pharnaces and the Gauls are hereby rescinded.

I could go on at considerable length calling attention to these ancient treaties, but coming to more modern times, the quadruple alliance which was entered into—1718—between Great Britain, France, the Netherlands, and Spain set up the same pretense for its existence. It recited that under a previous treaty—the triple alliance—provision had been made for peace to be brought about and established, and that by that treaty they "further gave a friendly invitation to his imperial majesty that out of his love for the public peace and quiet" he would join. And yet everyone knows that that treaty was in fact merely a treaty of compulsion, and that under it these nations acted together for the purpose of imposing their will upon other nations; but it speaks of peace, peace, always of peace.

Let us turn to the holy alliance—1815—which first invoked the blessing of God—

> And especially of the blessing which it has pleased Divine Providence to shower down upon those States which place their confidence and their hope in it alone.

Then it proceeds that having—> acquired the intimate conviction of the necessity of settling the steps to be observed by the powers, in their reciprocal relations, upon the sublime truths which the holy religion of our Saviour teaches, they solemnly declare that the present act has no other object than to publish in the face of the whole world their fixed resolution, both in the administration of their respective States and in their political relations with every other Government, to take for their sole guide the precepts of that holy religion, namely, the precepts of justice, Christian charity, and peace, which, far from being applicable only to private concerns, must have an immediate influence on the councils of princes and guide all their steps as being the only means of consolidating human institutions and remedying their imperfections.

So they declare their purpose being to protect religion, peace, and justice; and yet the sword of the Holy Alliance sprang from its scabbard at the first opportunity and was stained with the blood of every people daring to rise in their own defense, until at last the name "Holy Alliance" became synonymous with oppression and blood and rapine and murder.

The instrument creating the union of the five powers contained this language:

> (2) That this union, which is the more real and durable, inasmuch as it depends upon no separate interest or temporary combination, can only have for its object the maintenance of general peace, founded on a religious respect for the engagements contained in the treaties, and for the whole of the rights resulting therefrom.

All are familiar with the story of Europe at that time, and all know that these treaties, which bore the mask of soft professions and that carried seemly messages of peace and good will, soon resolved themselves into combinations to conquer and despoil the earth.

Now, Mr. President, coming to more modern times and leading up to the exact meaning of this treaty, I invite attention to the language of the triple alliance of 1879, between Austria-Hungary and the German Empire:

> Inasmuch as their Majesties the German Emperor, King of Prussia, and the Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary, must consider it their inalienable duty to provide for the security of their Empires and the peace of their subjects, under all circumstances; * * *
> Inasmuch as, finally, an intimate cooperation of Germany and Austria-Hungary can menace no one, but is rather calculated to consolidate the peace of Europe on the terms established by the stipulation of Berlin,
> Their Majesties, * * * while most solemnly promising never to allow their purely defensive agreement to develop an aggressive tendency in any direction, have determined to conclude an alliance of peace and mutual defense.

Mr. STANLEY. From what treaty is the Senator reading?

Mr. REED. The triple alliance between Germany and Austria-Hungary.

> ARTICLE I. Should, contrary to their hope, and against the loyal desire of the two high contracting parties, one of the two Empires be attacked by Russia, the high contracting parties are bound to come to the assistance one of the other—

And so forth.

ART. II. Should one of the high contracting parties be attacked by another power, the other high contracting party binds itself hereby, not only not to support the aggressor * * * but to observe at least a benevolent neutral attitude toward his fellow contracting party.

But who doubts what that treaty was made for? And, Mr. President, it is all in point, for we are dealing with nations impelled by similar motives, as every page of their history demonstrates.

Then, in 1903, the triple alliance was amended, and the first article reads:

The high contracting parties mutually promise peace and friendship * * *.

They bind themselves to proceed to negotiations on such political and economic questions of a general nature as may arise; and, moreover, promise their mutual support within the scope of their own interests.

That is exactly what is done by the present treaty. They bind themselves to proceed to negotiate—that is all—and yet everyone knows that that was the chain of steel in which they were held together. The language was construed that as the result of their negotiations they should act in common. Every time you find the phrase, wherein nations stipulate to consult together and to agree, it implies that the agreement shall be carried into effect; otherwise the proposition is itself idiotic. To consult and agree, and then not to carry out an agreement, is to consult and agree to do nothing.

Now, I want to call attention to and particularly emphasize the fact that these understandings between nations are of so delicate a character that in modern times they have not even been reduced to the form of treaties, and that those were the conditions existing between France and England. Yet as a result of those conditions England felt herself bound immediately to enter the Great War once France had been attacked. These conditions are contained in an exchange of letters. On November 22, 1912, Sir Edward Grey wrote to Cambon, the French minister:

I agree that if either Government had grave reason to expect an unprovoked attack by a third power, or something that threatened the general peace, it should immediately discuss with the other whether both Governments should act together to prevent aggression and to preserve peace, and, if so, what measures they would be prepared to take in common.

To discuss—that is all—and when they discuss to decide what measures should be taken. Is not the language in this treaty stronger than that? Let me call attention to it:

If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly—

That is the equivalent of "discuss," is it not?

In order to arrive at an understanding—

That is the equivalent, is it not, of the language of the four-power treaty—

In order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

Parallel it with the statement of Sir Edward Grey, print them in columns side by side, and do they not mean exactly the same thing? Let me read them both again, even at the risk of consuming a little time.

Sir Edward Grey to France:

I agree that, if either Government had grave reason to expect an unprovoked attack by a third power, or something that threatened the general peace, it should immediately discuss with the other whether both Governments should act together to prevent aggression and to preserve peace, and, if so, what measures they would be prepared to take in common.

Article II of the proposed treaty:

If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

The treaty, if anything, is more explicit and is stronger in its terms than was the language of Sir Edward Grey to M. Cambon.

There will be quibblers who will quibble, and dodgers who will dodge, and acrobats who will turn somersaults; but the man who will deny that that language is the equivalent of an agreement to consult and agree and act is either a knave or a fool. That is pretty strong language, but it is time to use strong language, because this instrument is an obligation which may mean again the unfurling of the battle flags to settle controversies abroad. It may mean conscription; it may mean again sending boys to die on foreign soil, because it is an agreement in advance, not a convention entered into when we are actually confronted with a situation that imperils our own safety.

The language of Sir Edward Grey was the pledge which carried the thin red line of England to the fields of France; and England responded with an alacrity and with a decisiveness and with an honesty that will be eternally to her credit. They went instantly, and out of that original army which marched forth and threw itself in front of the columns of the German advance scarce a man lived to tell the story. England kept her faith, as we will keep our faith, as we must keep our faith if we ratify this treaty.

There is a little more in the correspondence.

M. Cambon to Sir Edward Grey, November 23, 1912:

You reminded me in your letter of yesterday, 22d November, that during the last few years the military and naval authorities of France and Great Britain had consulted with each other from time to time; that it had always been understood that these consultations should not restrict the liberty of either Government to decide in the future whether they should lend each other the support of their armed forces; that, on either side, these consultations between experts were not and should not be considered as engagements binding our Governments to take action in certain eventualities; that, however, I had remarked to you that, if one or other of the two Governments had grave reasons to fear an unprovoked attack on the part of a third power, it would become essential to know whether it could count on the armed support of the other.

Your letter answers that point, and I am authorized to state that, in the event of one of our two Governments having grave reasons to fear either an act of aggression from a third power, or some event threatening the general peace, that Government would immediately examine with the other the question whether both Governments should act together in order to prevent the act of aggression or preserve peace. If so, the two Governments would deliberate as to the measures which they would be prepared to take in common.

"Deliberate as to the measures!" I read yet again from the four-power treaty:

Communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately.

You can not escape it. The language of this treaty is in part borrowed, and the scheme of this treaty is completely foreshadowed or outlined in the method employed by Great Britain and France to arrive at an understanding. That understanding, as they afterwards construed it, resulted in an immediate marching of troops the moment one of the parties deemed itself in danger.

Now, Mr. President, I want to call your attention to the source of more of the language of this treaty, for, as a matter of fact, in the Anglo-French arrangement, arrived at through letters, and in the Anglo-Japanese treaty we find phraseology so identical with the instrument now presented to the American people that one is bound to conclude that they were drawn by some man who had studied those treaties and their language, and who deliberately adopted the set phraseology of those treaties because it would have a defined and certain meaning.

The Governments of Great Britain and Japan, actuated solely by a desire to maintain the status quo and general peace in the extreme east—

That is the object of this treaty, is it not?

Being, moreover, specially interested in maintaining the independence and territorial integrity of the Empire of China and the Empire of Korea, and in securing equal opportunities in those countries for the commerce and industry of all nations, hereby agree as follows.

Since the day when Pontius Pilate, with hypocritical lips and more hyprocritical acts, professing to believe in justice and to be unwilling to be a party to the crucifixion, washed his hands and said, "Take ye Him and crucify Him," was there ever a more hypocritical document written than this one which in 1902 was signed by Great Britain and France, in which they declared that it was their mutual purpose to maintain the independence and territorial integrity of China and the Empire of Korea?

How long was it after that when Japan seized Korea? How long was it after that they began the active work of slicing up China and of declaring by their acts that China was legitimate prey for every international wolf who saw fit to fasten fangs into the helpless body of China?

Shall we enter into treaties such as this? This is the treaty to which we are to become the fourth party, France in the meantime having also united. Of course, the language is not the same, but the purpose is the same purpose. The present treaty is to take the place of this treaty, which was written with the pen of hypocrisy and stained with the blood of the innocent.

I continue to read from the Anglo-Japanese treaty:

Having in view, however, their special interests, of which those of Great Britain relate principally to China, while Japan, in addition to the interests which she possesses in China, is interested in a peculiar degree politically, as well as commercially and industrially, in Korea, the high contracting parties recognize that it will be admissible for either of them to take such measures as may be indispensable in order to safeguard those interests if threatened either by the aggressive action of any other power, or by disturbances arising in China or Korea, and necessitating the intervention of either of the high contracting parties for the protection of the lives and property of its subjects.

In the event Great Britain or Japan, "in the defense of their respective interests * * * should become involved in war with another power, the other high contracting party will maintain a strict neutrality." They did not agree there, as we agree in this treaty, to fight together, to stand together, to consult together, as to the best means of conquering the outside party. They simply agreed to maintain neutrality, each nation to "use its best effort to prevent other powers from joining in hostilities against its allies."

I spoke of the phraseology we find in the instrument now under consideration. That Anglo-Japanese treaty provided—

Whenever in the opinion of either Great Britain or Japan the above-mentioned interests are in jeopardy, the two Governments will communicate with one another fully and frankly.

There is not a word in that treaty about the two countries going to war together. Instead they agree to communicate with one another fully and frankly. Out of that treaty we get the language of the present instrument, which is—

The high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly.

When they signed that treaty England and Japan knew what the language "agree to communicate with one another fully and frankly" meant. They were not engaged in child's play. They were not going to communicate about inconsequential things. When they said they would communicate with each other fully and frankly, they meant that they would arrive at an understanding as the result of any such communication, and that that understanding would bind them, just as though two men were to agree, if I may drop into the vernacular, "All right; if your house is attacked to-night, send me word. If my house is attacked, I will send you word." What does it mean except that each will go to the rescue of the other?

Later they revised the treaty of 1905, and they say that "believing that a revision of that agreement responding to such changes would contribute to general stability and repose, have agreed," and so forth. I omit parts of it. It continues:

Such stipulations having the same object—

That is, the stipulations of the treaty of 1905, which this is to replace—

Such stipulations having the same object as the said agreement, namely:

The consolidation and maintenance of the general peace in the regions of eastern Asia and of India.

Is not that the purpose of this agreement which is now proposed to us? It is its avowed purpose. That can not be denied.

I read from the four-power treaty:

With a view to the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean—

The high contracting parties agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean.

The two treaties are substantially identical. Notice this language from the Anglo-Japanese treaty:

ARTICLE I. It is agreed that whenever, in the opinion of either Great Britain or Japan, any of the rights and interests referred to in the preamble of this agreement are in jeopardy, the two Governments will communicate with one another fully and frankly and will consider in common the measures which should be taken to safeguard those menaced rights or interests.

Article II of the four-power treaty reads:

If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

"To meet the exigencies of the particular situation" finds its parallel in the language of the Anglo-Japanese agreement "to safeguard those menaced rights or interests." There is absolutely no difference in the meaning; there is substantially no difference in the language.

It is true that later on in the Anglo-Japanese treaty it is stated, in article 5, that—

The conditions under which armed assistance shall be afforded by either power to the other in the circumstances mentioned in the present agreement and the means by which such assistance is to be made available will be arranged by the naval and military authorities of the high contracting parties.

But what does that add to the foregoing? It is merely a statement that the particular amount of power which each shall bring will be arranged by the military authorities. It would be so arranged without that statement. It adds not one jot or tittle to the preceding clause, and the preceding clause meant that under the Japanese treaty of 1902, as well as under the treaty of 1905, when they consulted together as to the best means to be employed, the best means, of course, meant the means which would be necessary. What means are practical against an enemy threatening your gates with his guns or invading your shores with his soldiers except other soldiers and other guns? They who consult as to the best means to be employed of course agree that they will select the best means. When the best means are selected it is pure idiocy to say they are not to be used; that when they are selected to be employed that they will not be employed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, do the terms of this treaty, or this alliance, bind us in any way beyond the islands of the Pacific Ocean?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that brings me now to the very theme I am about to discuss—the scope of the treaty.

In the first place, I am so reliably informed that I charge that on yesterday the Secretary of State admitted that the term "insular possessions" covered all parts of Japan, and it follows, therefore, that in so far as we are bound to protect any island anywhere we are bound to protect the entire Japanese Empire. The Japanese Empire is a group of islands. The language of this instrument is somewhat peculiar, "insular possessions and dominions," so that clearly, if Japan were attacked anywhere in any one of her islands, it would be an attack upon Japan. How else can we construe it? Each one of the islands constitutes Japan. There are larger islands and smaller islands, but no one of them constitutes Japan. She is a group of islands, a numerous body of islands. If, then, she were to be attacked in any one of those islands it would be an attack upon the Empire. She has, for instance, the following islands, and I give their area:

Principal islands.	Number of adjacent small islands.	Area in square miles.
		Principal islands.	Adjacent small islands.	Total.	Per cent.
Honshiu	167	86,953	473	87,426	33.53
Shikoku	74	6,907	176	7,083	2.72
Kiushiu	150	13,870	1,833	15,703	6.02
Hokkaido (excluding the Chishima)	13	30,340	162	30,502	11.70
Chishima or Kurile Islands (31 islands)	.....	6,068	.....	6,068	2.33
Sado	.....	337	.....	337	.13
Oki	1	130	1	131	.05
Awaji	1	219	1	220	.08
Iki	1	51	1	52	.02
Tsushima	5	263	3	266	.10
Riukiu (55 islands)	.....	941	.....	941	.36
Ogasawarajima or Bonin Islands (20 islands)	.....	27	.....	27	.01
Taiwan (Formosa)	14	13,911	33	13,944	5.35
Hokoto (Pescadores)	63	25	22	47	.02
Karafuto (Japanese Sakhalin)	.....	.....	.....	13,253	5.08

The truth of the matter is that Japan, as I have said, is merely a group of islands, and when you touch one of them you touch the body of Japan.

But, now, answering more at large the question of my friend from North Carolina, is this more than an agreement that is confined to the Pacific? In its terms it is confined to the Pacific, to the islands or insular possessions of those countries in the Pacific; but has anyone stopped to think that the Pacific Ocean washes about two-thirds of the earth's surface; that Japan's insular possessions are strung along Russia and along China, and that England, France, and Japan together own all of the islands or claim practically all of the islands in the Pacific Ocean?

Now, let us suppose that some of these islands are attacked by some power and that thereupon we consult together and we come to the rescue of the country whose islands are being attacked. Suppose we do that. Does the Senator from North Carolina think—I am sure he does not—that the fight would be confined to that island? Certainly, the fight would not be started until it would be spread to every vessel of the two nations upon the sea, to their entire commerce, and to attack upon their mainland, if necessary.

Let us be practical. War is war, and once war has been started it can not be confined to a particular spot of earth. Do we need any other illustration than the events of the last few years? An Austrian archduke went across the line into Serbia. A single individual shot him. That was the spark that lighted the conflagration that blazed around the world. Germany fired upon our ships upon the sea. We might have confined our business to laying in wait for German submarines and sinking them in the ocean and restricted our operations merely to a naval war. But, sir, the very sensible doctrine was advanced that such acts meant war between the United States and Germany, and if we were to make war with the German Empire the time to make it was then and the place to make it was on the soil of France or upon German territory, where already there were gathered the allied legions.

To talk of confining a war to the Pacific or to the islands of the Pacific would be childish, because a war once started is a war that involves both nations at least and all their members and all parties to the controversy wherever their trade and territory may lie. Was it not said by Macaulay that it was a shot in the forests of America that was heard around the world and lighted the conflagration that consumed Europe for many years? This alliance for the control of the Pacific, if it is ever violated by any outside power, means that the war will be fought wherever the two antagonists can meet. We might as well understand that.

Mr. President, let me draw a line of distinction between ordinary treaties and alliances. The line is perfectly clear. In an ordinary treaty between two nations, each acting independently and for itself, stipulates that it will do a particular thing or follow a particular line of conduct with reference to that particular nation and its own rights. There are two or three or four parties to the conference, but each has made an agreement for itself which is complete within itself and which does not bind any of the nations to submit their affairs to the arbitrament or decision of the other parties to the treaty. If either party to the treaty violates it the other party has the right to withdraw.

That is the exercise of sovereignty by a country. It is not the surrender of sovereignty. When we agreed with Great Britain that we would not place fortifications along the Canadian line and Great Britain agreed with us that she would not place fortifications there we were each exercising our sovereignty. Each nation was in complete control of the situation for all time and was bound only to keep the faith of its promise.

How different it would be if we had agreed between England and half a dozen other countries that the question of fortifications in the future should be referred to a vote or decision of the other countries. In that case we would no longer be determining our own policy. It would be determined for us by the votes of outside powers. We would have surrendered to that extent our control over our own affairs. We would to that extent have forfeited our sovereignty, for we would have transferred to the decision of outside parties the right to control our course of conduct.

Let me give a very simple illustration involving two farmers. They have a dispute over a line fence. They may not be able to agree as to just where it should be put, so they make an arrangement that they will allow a certain line to be the line between them, having the right between them of either of them to withdraw, upon proper notice, from that agreement. In that event each is perfectly free to act, each does act for himself, and each can withdraw from the agreement whenever he may desire to do so. In that event each one of them still is master of his own destiny and his own fate.

But suppose those two farmers were to agree that they would leave the location of that line to every tramp who happened to come along and ask for dinner or to every wayfarer who came along. Then the control of the line would no longer be in their hands, but they would have surrendered the right to decide it.

So when we make a treaty with any nation, no matter what we agree to do, it rests upon the honor of that nation and upon our honor as to whether it shall be carried out. In the construing of that treaty we always act freely and independently, and if the other party to the treaty gives it a construction which we believe is inimical to our interests and which we believe is unjust we have the right always to denounce the treaty, we have the right always to demand arbitration or some means of settlement. However, if we enter into an arrangement to which there are several parties, and agree to leave the settlement to the vote or decision of the several parties, then we no longer control ourselves, but we are controlled by the votes of outside parties. Let us apply that to this case.

We are entering into an arrangement with three other powers. We agree to a certain line of conduct. We agree that in the event there is outside disturbance we will consult together as to the best means of repelling the enemy. When we consult together as to the best means, when the nations meet for that consultation, how is the question to be determined? If we have made this agreement in good faith, are not we compelled to abide by the majority decision of the body? Do Senators find anything in this instrument that says that no party shall be bound except with its consent? It is not there. Do Senators find any provision requiring a two-thirds vote in order to be binding? It is not there. In consequence we have entered into a copartnership with these nations, and the decision of a majority would be a decision binding upon us. Let no man deny that on the other side of the Chamber, for upon the other side of the Chamber it was urged in the inception of the debate upon the League of Nations that a majority vote could bind. It was so urged by the distinguished leader upon the other side, if my recollection serves me right; and the point was so well taken that the league covenant was amended, requiring a two-thirds vote in certain cases and certain other votes in other cases.

We therefore find ourselves agreeing to consult together and to determine what course of conduct shall be pursued to repel a force that disturbs the peace of the Orient. In what posture would the United States be if, having ratified the treaty, the four powers meet to determine what course of conduct shall be taken, and the United States were to say, "Though three of you have voted in favor of a particular course, we refuse to carry out that decision"? Would it not be taken before all the world as a repudiation of the treaty? Does the language mean that the four nations shall proceed only by unanimous consent? If so, then no country is bound, no nation is held; all are perfectly free to act, and the treaty results in a cipher.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is a scrap of paper.

Mr. REED. Yes. A treaty binding nations to consult and agree upon a course of conduct and at the same time providing that a majority, or some majority, shall not determine that course of conduct; an agreement to agree to nothing.

Will the proponents of this treaty accept an amendment or reservation providing that the United States shall never be bound unless the United States shall vote for the particular proposition under consideration? If they do, of course, every other country will claim the same right. Then the whole force of this instrument will vanish.

What, then, is this treaty? It is a quadruple alliance. It has every element of an alliance which can be found in the Anglo-Japanese alliance; it has every element of alliance which can be found in the triple alliance recently in operation between Germany, Austria, and Hungary; it has every element of alliance which can be found in the Holy Alliance; and it has every element of alliance which can be found in the quadruple alliance of other days. It is merely a new quadruple alliance. The man who will deny that will be put to more quibbling than any ignorant lawyer ever adopted in a justice's court.

What is the scope of the treaty? I have already said that it embraces all the islands of the Pacific, and it embraces Japan itself; but what is the meaning of that scope? A war can not be waged upon the mainland between two parties for any considerable length of time but an attack upon the insular possession of that country is inevitable.

In the World War there lay Germany; France stood facing her; only the red line on the map was between them. There were the armed battalions; there was to be the scene of conflict; there the bloody strife was to be; yet on almost the first day of that war England struck Germany in the Orient; Japan mustered her brown soldiers and proceeded to make war upon the possessions of Germany. The war began on the mainland, but spread to the insular possessions within, I think I may say, 48 hours after the first shot had been fired.

And so when men talk of confining a war to islands or a war on the mainland to the mainland, they talk in the prattle of children; it is not so.

Let us see why we are asked to enter into this treaty; let us inquire why it is that Japan and Great Britain are yielding up their Anglo-Japanese alliance; and let us inquire as we go along what the Anglo-Japanese alliance indicated as to the purposes of England and Japan with reference to the United States and the remainder of the world. That secret alliance called upon these countries to make war upon any other country interfering with what they designated their rights in the Orient. We had rights in China—the right to trade; the right to the open door. They were asserting a right to do something more—to control that country, to partition it. They had well-defined policies of invasion, which were afterwards wrought out by Japan when she overwhelmed Korea, in which in that very treaty she had solemnly said she intended to protect. They were wrought out in the insistent demand upon the part of Japan for the seizure of Shantung, which she told all the world when we were here discussing the League of Nations, she was ready to vacate and did not desire to hold and would vacate, but not one foot of which she has vacated. It was an alliance distinctly inimical to American interests. It was the agreement of Great Britain and of Japan, in the event we ever interfered in any way with the possessions or policies of either of those countries in the Orient, that Great Britain, with her mighty fleet, would join with Japan in war.

Now, let me ask you, sirs, to use a little common sense for just a moment in regard to that. Suppose that we had a controversy with Japan over the question of immigration, and suppose that Japan had violated her agreement with reference to immigration, as the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] alleged she had done by placing in the record a document on yesterday. Suppose that such action should have resulted in a conflict between this country and Japan, what then?

We would have been met by this situation: We would have gone to grips with Japan. The war would have been on the ocean. We would have undoubtedly moved to the attack, and the attack would have been on Japanese vessels in Japanese waters protected by Japanese guns, so far as could be. It would have involved us in a complete onslaught upon everything that was Japanese, just as, if the tables were turned and they were able to do so, they would have attacked us from every direction possible.

In the event we had gone to grips and gone to attack Japan, though she was the aggressor in the conflict originally, what would have happened?

Article 1 of the Anglo-Japanese treaty:

It is agreed that whenever, in the opinion of either Great Britain or Japan, any of the rights and interests referred to in the preamble of this agreement are in jeopardy—

Any of the rights—

the two Governments will communicate with one another fully and frankly, and will consider in common the measures which should be taken to safeguard those menaced rights or interests. * * *

Article 5:

The conditions under which armed assistance shall be afforded by either power to the other in the circumstances mentioned in the present agreement, and the means by which such assistance is to be made available, will be arranged by the naval and military authorities of the high contracting parties, who will from time to time consult one another fully and frankly upon all questions of mutual interest.

Mr. President, it would have been impossible for Great Britain to have observed the terms of that treaty in case of a war between the United States and Japan without immediately casting her lot with Japan. Suppose, in carrying on that war, we should have endeavored to secure an uprising in China. China would immediately begin to interfere with Japanese rights on the seas; and so, again, Great Britain would have been drawn into the struggle. Now, we are asked to put our name to a document having exactly the same purposes. The only difference is that we become a party to the treaty.

There is the most imminent reason to believe that it will not be long until Japan and Russia must come to a settlement. It may be 5 years; it may be 10 years. Certainly he who prophesies with reference to the future of nations is guilty of an act of great temerity; yet I have no doubt that the 180,000,000 Russian people will eventually protect their soil, and when they do they will strike at the insular possessions of Japan that lie at their door. When that time comes, if we ratify this treaty, it will be our duty to send our ships and our men to defend and support Japan. We are asked to enter this treaty to protect the holdings of Japan and England and France in the Orient.

Again, sir, imagine that China should some day find her muscles grown taut as steel, the old fires of the past blaze again in her heart, and her people awaken and say, "There shall be an open door; through that open door we will cast out our oppressors, and through it also we will receive the trade and commerce of a friendly world." Suppose they were to attack the Japanese, who are now standing there, as I have said, with their hands upon China's throat. How long would it be until insular Japan would be brought in question, and until the peace of the Pacific would be disturbed? When that time came, if we kept faith, we would be obliged to throw the legions of America into the conflict against a peaceful, inoffensive, and friendly people.

We have heard much in the previous debates of the rape of Shantung. This makes us a party to that rape. This makes us a guarantor that the rape shall be not only consummate but unpunished. Ratify this treaty, and you sign the death warrant of China. Ratify this treaty, and you guarantee Japan in the possession of the islands she recently acquired. Ratify this treaty, and you make yourselves a second-rate power in the Pacific; for the union of Japanese and British fleets, bound as they are by their past interests and by their present interests, will dominate the waters of the Pacific.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator what would become of the Philippine Islands, which practically constitute the insular possessions of the United States in the Pacific, in the event the United States carries out the assurances that it has in effect given the Filipinos to grant them their independence as soon as they are able to govern themselves? When that independence is granted, those islands will no longer be the insular possessions of the United States. Will they be open prey to the Japanese or any other aggressive nation in the Orient?

Mr. REED. I should think we would meet and consult together. There would be three votes against us, and Japan or Great Britain would take them.

Mr. SHIELDS. They would then no longer come within the protection of this treaty, when the United States had granted them their independence.

Mr. REED. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. SHIELDS. They would no longer be our dominions or possessions.

Mr. REED. Certainly not.

Mr. President, let me tell you what controls nations, outside of our Nation—interest. Nations act together from mutual interest. Where are the mutual interests in this case? England took, as the result of this war, all of the islands held by Germany south of the Equator. Japan claimed to take all of the islands north of the Equator. In a controversy in which the United States opposed the rights of either, each would of necessity stand by the other; for if the United States were to say to England, "We protest against your claiming dominion over these islands, taken as the result of the last war," and Japan were to vote with the United States, Japan would know that the next day, when we protested against Japan claiming the islands north of the Equator, England would immediately vote with the United States and against Japan. Each of them being in the possession, I will not say of stolen goods, but of the spoils of war, they must stand together, and they will stand together.

Again——

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. While the Senator is on that subject, and not to divert him, he speaks of every nation except the United States being governed by interest. Assuming that all the high contracting parties to this treaty were as altruistic as we are, has Japan or France or England the same opportunity that we have to determine whether they will remain at peace or go to war?

What I mean is this: Germany may, when she gets stronger, determine to even up the score. Japan has her quarrel with China. The Empire of Great Britain is threatened with revolts which it would prevent if it could. In the event that these countries are invaded and war is made upon them—as it probably will be—what, then, would be the effect of this treaty upon the conduct of the United States?

Mr. REED. The very moment of disturbance in the Pacific Ocean we would be in the war, if we kept the faith.

Mr. President, we may do all the quibbling possible, but the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] stated the matter rightly when we were discussing the Versailles treaty:

There is to me no distinction whatever in a treaty between what some persons are pleased to call legal and moral obligations. A treaty rests and must rest, except where it is imposed under duress and securities and hostages are taken for its fulfillment, upon moral obligations. No doubt a great power impossible of coercion can cast aside a moral obligation if it sees fit and escape from the performance of the duty which it promises. The pathway of dishonor is always open.

If we make this treaty we must observe it, and we must observe it in its spirit.

I can not refrain at this time from calling attention to a remarkable situation.

We entered this war by the side of France. We had many things in common with her in our history, in the attachment of our peoples, and finally in the common spending of the blood of both nations in the great struggle with Germany. The former President brought to us a treaty providing that in case France were in the future unjustly assailed by Germany we would go to the rescue of France. There were many arguments in favor of that proposition, but the alliance between France and the United States for the protection of France against the country which had been our common enemy was refused consideration in this body. Now we are asked to enter into an alliance with Japan, Great Britain, and France, to protect their interests in the Orient, and France and Great Britain have not one foot of interest in the Orient except the title to property which they wrested by force, and except, of course, the right of trade, which is common to all nations.

Mr. SHIELDS. I believe the French treaty was conditioned on the consent of the League of Nations. We had to get their permission.

Mr. REED. Yes; that is true.

We would not make a treaty with France to protect her from Germany, but we propose to make a treaty with Japan to protect her in her loot gathered in the Orient. I wonder how much sugar-coating it will take to make that pill acceptable to Senators on the other side who were against the Versailles treaty and who were against the French treaty.

It has been suggested by the Senator from Tennessee that I discuss the relations of this treaty and the Versailles treaty. I am too weary to do that to-day, but shall undertake it later. I do want to say, however, that I think I know of an illustration of the way we will be situated with reference to the Versailles treaty if we enter into this treaty. There were once two unfortunate creatures in the world known as the Siamese twins, Chang and Eng. It is recited that they were united "between the xiphoid cartilages by a thick fleshy ligament having the navel on its lower border." One of them died and the other poor fellow found that he could not have the link which united them severed, and so Chang died because Eng died.

It is also said that one of them—I think it was Eng—was very intemperate, and used to get drunk and cut up all sorts of capers when he was drunk, and the other partner was a prohibitionist, and he found himself tied constantly to a drunken associate by this indissoluble bond of flesh.

It serves to illustrate my point. The three powers with which we propose to make this treaty are members of a European-Asiatic league of nations, with governing bodies asserting the right to interfere in every controversy affecting the peace of the world. The express language of article 3 and article 4 asserts that jurisdiction. Article 3 provides:

The assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

In article 4 it is recited that—

The council may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

Here, then, is asserted a world-wide jurisdiction in the league, with two governing bodies specifically authorized to interfere in any matter affecting the peace of the world.

Japan, France, and Great Britain are members of that league, and if the league were to determine to interfere in the Pacific Ocean in a way that was, in our opinion, offensive or detrimental to us, Japan, France, and Great Britain, under the command of the league, might be ordered to take the field against us, and they would be obliged to either break faith with us or to break faith with the league. I shall not discuss that further at present than to barely mention it.

Mr. President, I do not intend to end this discussion without inquiring somewhat as to the good faith we look for in the carrying out of campaign pledges and promises. Here is an agreement which it is proposed to enter into, under which we will consult with these nations—England, France, and Japan—as to the best means of repelling invasion in the Pacific. When that consultation is held there must be a decision, and, as I have said, the decision necessarily will be by a majority vote, because there is no other provision. To hold that the means are not to be decided by a majority vote is to hold that any one of the powers at any time can refuse its assent, and thus render the entire transaction nugatory. We therefore do agree to be bound by the actions of others, and to permit others to tell us what our course of conduct should be.

In that connection let me read to the Senate this statement:

I would not care to undertake to say to Great Britain what she must do, any more than I would permit her to tell us what to do with the Philippines.

But we are permitting her to tell us what we can do with the Philippines. This tribunal, which sets itself up to consult and determine with reference to the Pacific, can take up the questions of fortifications, and undoubtedly will take them up.

Who was it who said that he would not permit Great Britain to tell us what we could do in the Philippines? It was Senator Harding, at Des Moines, Iowa.

Again, there are those who say that this treaty binds us to nothing, and yet we find its language almost identical with the language contained in article 10 of the covenant of the League of Nations, which it was asserted did not bind us, because it was said in article 10 that—

In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council will advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

It was argued on both sides of the Chamber by proponents of the league that the word "advise" did not bind us; that all we agreed to do was to sit down and consult, and we did not agree to do anything after we had consulted. That was the claim they made at that time.

The answer was that the language must be honestly construed. So the present President of the United States, then a candidate, said at Kansas City:

We would have to keep our promise or sneak out of it. Let no one be deceived. The choice would be war or American dishonor. America will never countenance the cynical doctrine that a treaty is a mere scrap of paper.

The language of article 10, "the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation is to be fulfilled," does not parallel in its strength and its directness the provisions of this treaty, which declares that—

If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

In speaking of this same article 10, Senator Harding, on board his train on September 29, 1920, gave out this interview:

We can not pin our faith to hazy visions of the future without putting out of mind the stern realities of the past. It would be the appointee and representative of the President, not of Congress, nor of the people, who would either acquiesce in or reject a proposition of the council of the league to uphold by force of arms the cause of one power against another.

Treating the language of article 10 as implying that we should go to war at the command of the council of the league, and treating it correctly in that way, as I believed then and as I believe now. Yet here we find the same kind of representation to which he then objected will be the kind of representation we will have on this body, and we find that the jurisdiction of this body to make war or demand war is undoubtedly much greater than could be evolved from the language of the league.

Again, we set up here a council of foreign powers with reference to all matters in the Pacific, do we not? Is there any man here who will deny that? If there is, then he would deny anything. But what did the candidate for President say then?

End one-man government and preserve national integrity from encroachment by a council of foreign powers.

That was in his inaugural address. He was already President and that was his first message to the people.

End one-man government and preserve national integrity from encroachment by a council of foreign powers.

And yet he proposes to turn over the Pacific Ocean, all our western coast being involved in it, all of the islands of the Philippines being involved in it. He proposes to turn them over to a council of four nations in which we will have one vote, a vote exactly equal to that of Japan, except that Japan will have the influence of Great Britain, which we do not possess, an influence because their interests in the Orient are in common, and France will have a somewhat similar interest, for she has been in the land-grabbing business for some years herself.

We have deliberately agreed to sit down at a table and work out policies of government and control which apply to all the islands of the Pacific, to all the waters of the Pacific, to all the nations of the earth, properly construed. We agree to sit down and consult with other nations and plan and agree upon plans concerning the future course of the conduct of ourselves and the other nations. We do that, do we not? What is that but an alliance? What is it but an entangling alliance? And yet we find this language:

Confident of our ability to work out our own destinies and jealously guarding our rights to do so, we seek no part in directing the destinies of the Old World. We do not mean to be entangled. We will accept no responsibility save as our own conscience and our judgment in each instance may determine.

That is the situation of the United States to-day. That is the situation I contended for in my weak way for many weeks and months, that we should remain free, to "accept no responsibility save as our own conscience and our own judgment in each instance might determine."

Now, it is proposed that as to half the waters of the world, as to all the questions which may spring up in the Orient, for they are all involved, possibly as to every war of any importance which may hereafter be waged, we no longer determine for ourselves, for we sign a treaty to sit down with a Britisher, with a Frenchman, and with a Japanese, and at that conference table to determine in concert with them. We are to-day free to act. This body of diplomats meeting here in Washington are each free; no one is compelled to sign any treaty; but once they put pen to paper and pledge the faith of their countries to a common course of action and to a governing body to determine that course, or a method by which it can be determined by the representatives of the various nations, they are no longer free to walk their own road and determine their own course of conduct.

How would you feel, Senators, if, when this conference met here to determine the size of the navies of the world, we had known in advance that they should meet in secret and have a secret vote on the number of ships the United States might have, and that they might by their vote make us a fourth-rate naval power? That would have been the case if we had agreed in advance by treaty to call this conference and to abide by the results of the conference. But when these gentlemen met, each representing his respective nation, each was free to come in or stay out. Once we sign this treaty, in so far as questions coming within its purview are concerned, we are no longer free to determine the question as our conscience dictates, as the President said was his policy, but we are left to have it determined for us by others. I wish we could bring the President back to that sound, solid ground, the ground that Washington took:

We sense the call of the human heart for fellowship, fraternity, and cooperation. We crave friendship and harbor no hate.

Beautiful words and very true, although I could always get enough fellowship somewhere within the confines of the United States. I never found myself getting homesick for some foreign stepmother. We have been indulging in a good deal of verbal mush lately, talking about our hearts longing for fellowship with countries we never saw and with people whose language we can not understand. It would be more consistent with good sense if we said: We respect the peoples of other lands; we accord them their rights; we ask them to respect us and our rights. However, I do not make a point of that. We always allow for a little oratorical extravagance in a political campaign.

President Harding said:

We sense the call of the human heart for fellowship, fraternity, and cooperation. We crave friendship and harbor no hate. But America, our America, the America builded on a foundation laid by the inspired fathers, can be a part of no permanent military alliance.

That is what this treaty is.

It can enter into no political commitment nor assume any economic obligations nor subject our decision to any other than our own authority.

Yet what are we asked to do here? We are asked to enter into a quadruple alliance to control the Pacific Ocean and the Orient, and to make that alliance with the only nation that has shown an ugly set of teeth toward us in many a year. I, of course, except our war with Germany.

Again, Memorial Day, May 30, Arlington, amidst the holy graves where patriotic souls forever rest:

I counsel no selfishness, no little Americanism, no mere parochialism, when I urge that our first duty is to our own. Our maintained freedom is the source of our rights.

Now, get this sentence:

Only the American conscience may command this Republic.

This is an American sentence that ought to be chiseled in the granite, it ought to be preserved in imperishable bronze. That sentence ought to be written in the hearts and conscience and soul of the American people.

Only the American conscience may command this Republic.

But it is proposed here that we shall enter into an agreement which I say no honest man can deny binds us to submit great and vital questions to the arbitrament of three other powers associated with us. Not the American conscience in that case, but mayhap the Japanese conscience will command us.

It will be replied that we do not bind ourselves to do anything. Then I demand we shall write that in the face of this document.

It will be said that we are still free to come or go at will, to act or refuse to act, and under no obligation, direct or implied, moral or otherwise. If so, I demand that it be written in the face of this document. If I were to write it in the face of this document, I would defeat the very purpose of those who prepared the document.

What would have happened had we gone into the League of Nations? I opposed that instrument; many eminent Senators supported it. I thought I saw in the arrangement a situation where the United States might be outvoted, and our interests sadly crippled, but other Senators thought it safe to submit our interests to such a body. Of course it was at first asserted then, as it is now asserted, that there was no governing body, and that there was no power to bind; but this much could be said for the League of Nations—and I am speaking now as one of its opponents—that it did contemplate bringing in all the nations of the world. It therefore set up a body to compose, if possible, all difficulties, and there was always a chance, if we found ourselves menaced, that the conflicting interests of the various nations would be such that there would be nothing done that would injure us. That was an argument to which I did not want to trust my country, but others were willing to do so. I retract no word of what I then said, but that league did have a governing body; and if anything is to function outside of mere conference, where mutual good will may be worked out, there must be a governing body. Yet, speaking with reference to that body, Mr. Harding, on July 22, 1920, said:

The Republicans of the Senate halted the barter of independent American eminence and influence which it was proposed to exchange for an obscure and unequal place in the merged government of the world—

This is the "merged government" of the Pacific, in which we have perhaps numerically an equal place, but he who declares that the United States is entitled only to an equal place with Japan in matters which concern American interests, in my judgment, speaks a language which can not be understood by the American electorate.

Our party means to hold the heritage of American nationality unimpaired and unsurrendered. * * * Our sympathy for Europe only magnified our own good fortune in resisting involvement.

Now, it is proposed that we shall become involved.

It is better to be the free and disinterested agent of international justice and advancing civilization, with the covenant of conscience, than be shackled by a written compact which surrenders our freedom of action and gives to a military alliance the right to proclaim America's duty to the world.

This is the same proposition, except that it is limited to the Pacific; and, as I have already said, war can not be limited to the waters of the Pacific any more than smallpox may be limited by the red line on a map. Mr. Harding continued:

No surrender of rights to a world council or its military alliance, no assumed mandatory, however appealing, ever shall summon the sons of this Republic to war. Their supreme sacrifice shall only be asked for America and its call of honor. There is a sanctity in that right we will not delegate.

What do we agree to do in this treaty? It provides:

If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power—

That is, if the rights of the high contracting parties, or any of them, in any of their insular possessions or dominions, are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power—

The high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

The nation that ratifies that agreement and does not make good stands dishonored; and the nation will not make good unless it employs the most efficient measures to meet the exigency.

The exigency is war, and there has nothing yet ever been efficient in war except men and metal and poison gas and aitplanes and bloody swords and battles to the death. Of course, a pettifogger can distinguish, but a man who looks this contract in the face will not try to pettifog.

Mr. President, just one or two more quotations from President Harding. I speak of him with great respect, and it is my respect that puts a bridle on my tongue to-day. What has been our habitual traditional policy? It has been read many times, but it ought to be read many times more. Here I propose to tie the cord so tight that there will be only one escape by the President, and that is by the same method employed by a certain gentleman named Alexander, who cut the knot which he could not untie. I quote from the immortal Farewell Address of George Washington:

Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence, (I conjure you to believe me, fellow citizens,) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake; since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people, to surrender their interests.

There were engagements then made.

The great rule of conduct for us, in regard to foreign nations, is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith:—Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, of a very remote relation. Hence, she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation, when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliance with any portion of the foreign world; so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it—

Having reference, of course, to the old treaties then existing.

Mr. President, that was the traditional policy of America; that meant no treaties of alliance; that meant to stay at home and attend to our own business; that meant that we were strong enough, or would soon be strong enough, to maintain our rights and defend our neutrality; that meant no entanglements, no alliances, no agreements in the nature of alliances. It was the fine doctrine under which we prospered. It was our traditional policy. Now, let me read another extract. On September 11, 1919, this language was used by Mr. Harding in the Senate in speaking of the proposed Versailles treaty:

It was an unspeakable thing to abandon our "habitual and traditional" policy and seek entanglements in Old World controversies then, when actual conflict was threatening our very safety, but only the selfishness or ignorance of a spirit of bolshevism is debating it now. Surely, the American people will not compare without understanding.

I repeat, "it was an unspeakable thing to abandon our habitual and traditional policy."

Involvement piles upon involvement and responsibility upon responsibility until independence of action fades into precious memory and nationality becomes a lost inheritance.

He was discussing the proposed alliances with other nations.

We do not need Europe or Asia to define our moral obligations; we do not need the Old World to quicken the American conscience.

Again:

To adopt any other policy, to call an international council to destroy the American spirit, would rend the life of the Republic.

But it is all right to get a Jap and a Britisher and a Frenchman off here to agree on what America shall do in half the world.

But suppose it makes for the promised peace, I still prefer, and the great majority of Americans still prefer, to be the keepers of our national conscience and let Europe pass upon its moral obligations while we righteously meet our own.

Again:

I have a confidence in our America that requires no council of foreign powers to point the way of American duty. We wish to counsel, cooperate, and contribute, but we arrogate to ourselves the keeping of the American conscience and every concept of our moral obligations.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, will the Senator state from whom he read the last quotation?

Mr. REED. All the quotations I have been reading were from Mr. Harding when he was a candidate, or from George Washington. There would be some difficulty in distinguishing some of his statements from those of George Washington, except as one is acquainted with Washington's exact words, because many of them were absolutely in consonance with Washington's statements. I am wondering just how they are to be squared to-day with Washington's statements or with Mr. Harding's statements.

For myself, I appeal from President Harding to Mr. Harding, from the holder of the office to the man who sought the office, from the gentleman surrounded by the intriguing diplomats of foreign powers to the man surrounded by a sea of American faces when he was standing for their suffrages. No matter what is done in this controversy, it will go to the American people again. It will go there already defeated in its principles, and it will go there with a full understanding on the part of the American people that it has all of the vices charged against the treaty of Versailles, and not one of its virtues.

Of course, it is ushered in with all the incense and the red lights. It was to be accepted at once in the Senate. I repeat the expression of yesterday: Everybody was in favor of peace. Everybody was in favor of reducing armaments if it could be done in such a way as to leave our country reasonably safe. That is what this conference was called for; and upon that course, which everybody favored, they have tied a quadruple alliance—an alliance with the only power that has been acting in an unfair way toward America; an alliance with a nation that has impudently asserted the right to land her people upon our soil and to interfere with the right of the sovereign States of the Pacific coast to pass laws regulating the landholdings of aliens, although that right has been exercised in America by the American States ever since we have had an American Government. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] spoke here as the defender and sponsor of the contemplated alliance with Japan, but no sooner had he taken his seat on day before yesterday than he put into the RECORD an assertion that Japan had broken faith and was now breaking faith with the United States.

I wonder what the people of the Pacific coast think of their new protector. I wonder how much confidence springs to the hearts of the American people when they think: "If any of our possessions in the Pacific should be attacked, we have Japan to rely on." With what serene confidence we could go to bed at night and say, "Japan is looking after the Philippines"! Why not junk our Navy altogether, and just trust this whole thing to Japan and Great Britain?

What do we receive from this treaty? I am not referring to the matter of disarmament, as we sometimes call it, though it is a misnomer—the reduction of armament. Of course, we suffer most by that; but I am not discussing that question. What do we get out of the treaty of alliance? We have no oriental possessions except the Philippine Islands. We ought to give the Philippines their liberty, and I am in favor of doing it. We have two or three coaling stations. We have trade in China, as we have with every other country in the world; but is it seriously menaced; and if so, is it protected by this treaty? If it be menaced, then who is menacing it? Our new ally and Great Britain are the only countries that are pretending to assert any authority that could menace it. If we were entirely shut out of China to-morrow, it would mean some loss of trade; but the nation closing the door of China in our face could be brought to time very speedily, for it is much more important to that nation to have trade with the American Republic than it is to shut America out of the trade of China.

What, then, do we get? Substantially nothing.

What do the other parties to this compact get? All the islands of the Pacific Ocean, outside of the Philippines and the Hawaiian Islands, are owned by these other nations, or controlled by them, or claimed by them. They get our contract to defend these islands that are "scattered like lilies" over the ocean. They get our contract to defend the whole domain of Japan; for, as I have shown, Japan is all insular. They get our contract to preserve their peace, even though China might rise some day to demand back the loot. They get our contract to defend these islands, even though Russia should some day seek to drive the Japs from her soil, and in so doing to take possession of islands along her coast. They get our contract that we, with our men and our money, with our blood and our treasure, with our Army and our Navy, will respond to the "understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly or separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular occasion"—which is a war, as shown by the context.

Why, then, should we make this treaty? What good sense is there in making this treaty? Is it to get rid of the Anglo-Japanese alliance? If it be true that Great Britain, notwithstanding our ties of blood and our ties of language and of trade, notwithstanding all the professions of friendship and brotherly love we have heard in the last three or four years, has a treaty with Japan which menaces the American Republic, then let us know it, and I want no treaties with Great Britain after that. If that be the temper of their spirit, if that be the thought in their hearts, if that be their purpose toward us, then the more complete our divorcement and the sooner it comes the better for this Republic.

Mr. President, I have kept the Senate an unconscionable length of time, and there are other questions just as important as those I have discussed to come up. I thank the Senate for its attention. I know other Senators will give this matter very careful and patient attention.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to state that so far as the friends of this treaty are concerned, they will not discuss its provisions until it is submitted to the Senate for consideration.

TRADE WITH CHINA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4810) to authorize the incorporation of companies to promote trade in China.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the pending question be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending question, which is the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That this act may be cited as the "China trade act," 1921.

SEC. 2. When used in this act, unless the context otherwise indicates—

(a) The term "person" includes individual, partnership, corporation, and association;

(b) The term "China" means (1) China, including Manchuria, Thibet, Mongolia, and any territory leased by China to any foreign Government; (2) the Crown Colony of Hongkong; and (3) the Province of Macao;

(c) The term "China trade corporation" and "corporation" means a corporation organized under this act;

(d) The term "Federal district court" means any Federal district court, United States Court for China, and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; and

(e) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Commerce.

SEC. 3. Five or more individuals (hereafter in this act referred to as "incorporators"), a majority of whom are citizens of the United States, may, as hereinafter in this act provided, form a corporation for the purpose of engaging in commerce between the people of the United States and the people of China. The incorporators may adopt articles of incorporation which shall be filed with the Secretary and may thereupon make application to the Secretary for a certificate of incorporation in such manner and form as he shall by regulation prescribe. The articles of incorporation shall state—

(a) The name of the proposed China trade corporation, which shall end with the legend, "Federal Inc. U. S. A.," and which shall not, in the opinion of the Secretary, be likely in any manner to mislead the public;

(b) The location of its principal office, which may be anywhere in China or the United States;
(c) The particular business in which the corporation is to engage;
(d) The amount of the authorized capital stock, the designation of each class of stock, and the terms upon which it is to be issued, and the number and par shares of each class of stock;
(e) The duration of the corporation, which may be for a period of not more than 25 years, but which may, in accordance with the provisions of this act, be successively renewed for like periods;
(f) The names and addresses of individuals, a majority of whom are citizens of the United States, to be designated by the incorporators, who shall serve as temporary directors; and
(g) The fact that an amount equal to 25 per cent of the amount of the capital stock has been in good faith subscribed and paid (1) in cash, or (2) in accordance with the provisions of section 7, in real or personal property which has been placed in the custody of the directors.

SEC. 4. The Secretary shall issue a certificate of incorporation to the corporation certifying that the provisions of this act have been complied with and declaring that the incorporators are a body corporate, if (a) a fee not to exceed $100 has been paid to the Secretary, and (b) the Secretary finds that the articles of incorporation and statements therein conform to the requirements of, and that the incorporation is authorized by, this act. A copy of the articles of incorporation shall be made a part of the certificate of incorporation and printed in full thereon. Any failure, previous to the issuance of the certificate of incorporation by the incorporators, or in respect to the application for the certificate of incorporation, to conform to any requirement of law which is a condition precedent to such issuance, may not subsequent thereto be held to invalidate the certificate of incorporation or alter the legal statuts of any act of a China trade corporation, except in proceedings instituted by the Secretary for the revocation of the certificate of incorporation of the corporation.

SEC. 5. In addition to the powers granted elsewhere in this act, a China trade corporation—
(a) Shall have the right of succession during the existence of the corporation;
(b) May have a corporate seal and alter it at pleasure;
(c) May sue and be sued;
(d) Shall have the right to transact the business authorized by its articles of incorporation and such further business as is properly connected therewith or necessary and incidental thereto;
(e) May make contracts and incur liabilities;
(f) May acquire and hold real or personal property, necessary to effect the purpose for which it is formed, and dispose of such property when no longer needed for such purposes;
(g) May borrow money and issue its notes, coupon or registered bonds, or other evidence of debt, and secure their payment by a mortgage of its property; and
(h) May establish such branch offices at such places as it deems advisable.

SEC. 6. Each share of the original or any subsequent issue of stock of a China trade corporation shall be issued at par value only and may be paid for (1) in cash, or (2) in accordance with the provisions of section 7, in real or personal property which has been placed in the custody of the directors. When issued, each share of stock shall have indorsed on its face the portion of the par value thereof that has been paid to the corporation for such share. Except as to creditors, any share of stock represented by a certificate incorrectly indorsed or by a certificate indorsed with the statement that an amount equal to the par value of the stock has been paid to the corporation, shall be held to be paid in the amount of the indorsement; and any share of stock represented by a certificate not indorsed shall be held full paid and nonassessable.

SEC. 7. No share of stock of a China trade corporation shall, for the purpose of section 6 or of subdivision (g) of section 3, be held paid in real or personal property unless (1) a certificate describing the property and stating the value at which it is to be received has been filed by the corporation with the Secretary in such manner as he shall by regulation prescribe, and a fee to be fixed by the Secretary to cover the cost of any necessary investigation shall have been paid to him, and (2) the Secretary finds and has certified to the corporation that such value is not more than the fair market value of the property.

SEC. 8. The stockholders of every corporation shall be severally and individually liable to the creditors of the corporation in which they are stockholders, to the amount of unpaid stock held by them, respectively, for all acts and contracts made by such corporation, until the whole amount of capital stock subscribed for shall have been paid in.

SEC. 9. The by-laws may provide—
(a) The time, place, manner of calling, giving notice, and conduct of and determination of a quorum for the meetings, annual or special, of the stockholders or directors;
(b) The number, qualifications, and manner of choosing and fixing the tenure of office and compensation of all directors; but the number of such directors shall be not less than three, of whom a majority shall be citizens of the United States;
(c) The manner of calling for and collecting payments upon stock subscribed for, the penalties and forfeitures for nonpayment, the preparation of certificates of stock, and the manner of recording the sale or transfer of stock and its representation at stockholders' meetings.
(d) The manner in which stock of the corporation may be made assessable and the procedure for the forfeiture and sale of stock for delinquent assessments, but no such by-law shall be valid except it provide that the resolution declaring the stock assessable be approved by a vote of not less than two-thirds of the stock outstanding, at a meeting at which three-fourths of such stock is represented.

SEC. 10. (a) Within six months after the issuance of the certificate of incorporation of a China trade corporation there shall be held a stockholders' meeting thereof. Such meeting shall be called by a majority of the directors named in the articles of incorporation and each stockholder shall be given at least 90 days' notice of the meeting either in person or by mail. The holders of two-thirds of the voting shares shall constitute a quorum at such meeting authorized to transact business. At this meeting or an adjourned meeting thereof a code of by-laws for the corporation shall be adopted by a majority of the voting shares represented at the meeting.
(b) The following questions shall be determined only by the stockholders at a stockholders' meeting:
(1) Adoption of the by-laws;
(2) Amendments to the articles of incorporation or by-laws;
(3) Authorization of the sale of the entire business of the corporation or of an independent branch of such business;
(4) Authorization of the voluntary dissolution of the corporation; and
(5) Authorization of application for the renewal of the period of duration of the corporation.
(c) The adoption of any such amendment or authorization shall require the approval of at least two-thirds of the voting shares. No amendment to the articles of incorporation or authorization for dissolution or renewal shall take effect until (1) the corporation files a certificate stating the action taken, in such manner and form as the Secretary shall by regulation prescribe, and (2) such amendment or authorization is found and certified by the Secretary to conform to the requirements of this act.

SEC. 11. The directors designated in the articles of incorporation shall, until their successors take office, direct the exercise of all powers of a China trade corporation, except such as are conferred upon the stockholder by law or by the articles of incorporation or by-laws of the corporation. Thereafter the directors elected in accordance with the by-laws of the corporation shall exercise such powers. In the exercise of such powers the directors may appoint and remove and fix the compensation of such officers and employees of the corporation as they deem advisable.

SEC. 12. For the purposes of this act the fiscal year of a China trade corporation shall correspond to the calendar year. The corporation shall make and file with the Secretary, in such manner and form and at such time as he shall by regulation prescribe, a report of its business for each such fiscal year and of its financial condition at the close of the year. The corporation shall furnish a true copy of the report to each of its stockholders.

SEC. 13. The Secretary may, in order to ascertain if the affairs of a China trade corporation are conducted contrary to any provision of this act, of any other law, or any treaty of the United States, or the articles of incorporation or by-laws of the corporation, investigate the affairs of the corporation. The Secretary, whenever he is satisfied that the affairs of any China trade corporation are or have been so conducted, may institute in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia proceedings for the revocation of the certificate of incorporation of the corporation. The court may revoke such certificate if it finds that the affairs of such corporation have been so conducted. Pending final decision in the revocation proceedings, the court may at any time, upon application of the Secretary or upon its own motion, make such orders in respect to the conduct of the affairs of the corporation as it deems advisable.

SEC. 14. For the efficient administration of the functions vested in the Secretary by this act, he may require, by subpœna issued by him or under his direction, (a) the attendance of any witness and the production of any book, paper, document, or other evidence from any place in China at any designated place of hearing in China, or, if the witness is actually resident or temporarily sojourning outside of China, at any designated place of hearing within 50 miles of the actual residence or place of sojourn of such witness, and (b) the taking of a deposition before any designated person having power to administer oaths. In the case of a deposition the testimony shall be reduced to writing by the person taking the deposition or under his direction, and shall then be subscribed by the deponent. The Secretary or any officer, employee, or agent of the United States under the jurisdiction of the Secretary and authorized in writing by him may administer oaths and examine any witness. Any witness summoned before the Secretary and any witness whose deposition is taken shall be paid the same fees and mileage as are paid witnesses in the courts of the United States.
(b) In the case of failure to comply with any subpœna or in the case of the contumacy of any witness before the Secretary, or any person so authorized by him, the Secretary or such person may invoke the aid of any Federal district court, or the United States Court for China. Such court may thereupon order the witness to comply with the requirements of such subpœna and to give evidence touching the matter in question. Any failure to obey such order may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.
(c) No person shall be excused from so attending and testifying or deposing, nor from so producing any book, paper, document, or other evidence on the ground that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to incriminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture; but no natural person shall be prosecuted or subject to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing as to which, in obedience to a subpœna and under oath, he may so testify. But no person shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.
(d) For the efficient administration of the functions vested in the Secretary by this act, he, or any officer, employee, or agent of the United States under his jurisdiction and authorized in writing by him, shall at all reasonable times for the purpose of examination have access to and the right to copy any book, account, record, paper, or correspondence relating to the witness or affairs of a China trade corporation. Any person who upon demand refuses the Secretary or any duly authorized officer, employee, or agent such access or opportunity to copy, or hinders, obstructs, or resists him in the exercise of such right, shall be liable to a penalty of not more than $5,000 for each such offense. Such penalty shall be recoverable in a civil suit brought in the name of the United States, and shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 15. In case of the voluntary dissolution of a China trade corporation or revocation of its certificate of incorporation the directors of the corporation shall be trustees for the creditors and stockholders of the corporation; except that upon application to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia by any interested party, or upon the motion of any court of competent jurisdiction in any proceeding pending before it, the court may in its discretion appoint as the trustees such persons, other than the directors, as it may determine. The trustees are invested with the powers, and shall do all acts, necessary to wind up the affairs of the corporation and divide among the stockholders according to their respective interests the property of the corporation remaining after all obligations against it have been settled. For the purposes of this section the trustees may sue and be sued in the name of the corporation and shall be jointly and severally liable to the stockholders and creditors of the corporation to the extent of the property coming into their hands as trustees.

SEC. 16. That the law of the State of California, except where contrary to the Constitution or any treaty of the United States or to this act or any other law of the United States, shall be regarded as the rule of decision in civil trials in cases originating in the United States Court for China or consular courts in China, against a China trade corporation or any stockholder, director, or officer thereof in his capacity as such, or trustee under the provisions of section 15.

SEC. 17. No stockholder, director, officer, employee, or agent of a China trade corporation shall make, issue, or publish any statement, written or oral, or advertisement in any form, as to the value or as to the facts affecting the value of stocks, bonds, or other evidence of debt, or as to the financial condition or transactions, or facts affecting such condition or transactions, of such corporation if it has issued or is to issue stocks, bonds, or other evidences of debt, whenever he knows or has reason to believe that any material representation in such statement or advertisement is false. No stockholder, director, officer, employee, or agent of a China trade corporation shall, if all the authorized capital stock thereof has not been paid in, make, issue, or publish any written statement or advertisement, in any form, stating the amount of the authorized capital stock without also stating the amount actually paid in, a sum not greater than the amount paid in. Any person violating any provision of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.

SEC. 18. No (a) individual, partnership, or association, (b) corporation not incorporated under this act or under a law of the United States, or (c) corporation of the District of Columbia, shall engage in commerce among the several States or with foreign nations under a name in connection with which the legend "Federal Inc. U. S. A." is used. Any person violating this section shall upon conviction thereof be fined not more than $1,000 for each violation.

SEC. 19. The Congress of the United States reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal any provision of this act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the incorporation of companies to promote trade with China."

Mr. CUMMINS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Chair appointed Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. BRANDEGEE, and Mr. WALSH of Montana conferees on the part of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. SMITH and Mr. KENYON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I rose for the purpose of calling up the bill which the Senator from Iowa gave notice on yesterday he would call up. I yield to him for that purpose now.

Mr. KENYON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2263, a bill to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. SMITH. I offer an amendment to the bill in the form of a substitute.

Mr. KENYON. I think it is generally understood that we will not go ahead with the bill to-night, but that it shall be made the unfinished business. That is the general understanding of Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the unfinished business.

Mr. KENYON. I will ask unanimous consent that it be laid aside temporarily, and restored before adjournment.

Mr. SMITH. In touching the point the Senator from Iowa is now discussing, it is the rule of the Senate that where a bill such as the one which is now the unfinished business has been called up and is temporarily laid aside, it does not lose its status as unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the rule.

Mr. KENYON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business, Senate bill 2263, be temporarily laid aside, to be restored before the Senate adjourns.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns to-day it stand adjourned until Monday at 12 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SNAKE RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I report back favorably without amendment, from the Committee on Commerce, the bill (S. 2831) to authorize the State of Washington to construct a bridge across the Snake River at or near Central Ferry in or about section 9, township 13 north, range 40 east, Willamette meridian, and I submit a report (No. 365) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill, which is in the usual form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the State of Washington be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct and maintain a bridge and approaches thereto across Snake River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Central Ferry, in or about section 9, township 13 north, range 40 east, Willamette meridian, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REVENUES OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to submit a resolution asking for the return of a bill from the House. After we had passed the bill relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia, and after it was enrolled and sent to the Printing Office, some changes were made in it, so that the bill which was sent to the House was not the bill passed by the Senate. In addition to that there was one word left out of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] which everyone really understood and thought was in the amendment, and I desire to have that correction made when the bill is returned, so I ask for the adoption of the resolution I send to the desk.

The resolution (S. Res. 196) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be, and hereby is, requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 205) entitled "An act relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

SUGAR IMPORTED FROM ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate passed a joint resolution providing for the reimbursement to a sugar corporation of a certain sum lost by reason of an importation for the Government directly through the Department of Justice. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may take up Senate joint resolution 79, authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 5,000 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic, which is similar in character to the joint resolution passed yesterday.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I do not desire to interpose an objection to the consideration of the joint resolution, but if the Senator expects an adjournment in any reasonable time to-day he had better put it off, because my understanding of the joint resolution is quite different from that which he entertains. I think it rests upon an entirely different basis from that of the joint resolution passed yesterday. I believe it will lead to a good deal of discussion, and I do not believe the Senate wants to go into that at this time of day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I was present during most of the debate on the joint resolution which was passed for the benefit of the American Trading Co. and have read the report of the debates which took place in my absence and I know the circumstances in both of these transactions. I wish to say to the Senator in all sincerity and truth that, in my opinion, there is no difference between the two claims. They are both good-faith obligations of the Government and nothing else. The only difference is that one was a sugar corporation which managed the trade and the other was a shipping corporation which did not. I should like to know what the Senator's objections are to this claim.

Mr. WILLIS. That is what I am prepared to state to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In what particular do the claims differ?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not like to undertake to defeat legislation, as the Senator knows, particularly legislation in which he is interested, by interposing an objection; but I think this joint resolution rests upon an entirely different foundation. The element of profit enters into this claim which did not enter into the other. I think a very clear line of cleavage is distinguishable between the two, and if the joint resolution is taken up it will take considerable time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The element of loss enters into this as well. I simply wish to say to the Senator that my only interest in this question is a desire to correct an injustice which I believe has been done to a constituent in my State. If the Government is obligated under the previous joint resolution, which passed, it is obligated under this one; and having established the precedent, I think it is the duty of the Government to pay this claim, as Congress has already passed legislation to pay the other claim.

I do not understand what the Senator means by the element of profit. I understand that this profit was exceedingly small. The transaction was entered into by reason of advances made by an agent of the Department of Justice at a later date than that of the agreement with the American Trading Co. They urged this concern to import the sugar; and they refused to allow them to resell it in Argentina when the market was falling, and had fallen far below the level to which it had fallen in the case of the American Trading Co. Therefore I think there is greater justice in this claim than in the other.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not want to object, but I desire to say to the Senator from New Jersey that the joint resolution will provoke discussion. There are several Senators upon this side who desire to examine the matter and discuss it; and I ask the Senator, in the interest of good fellowship, to let the joint resolution go over until Monday, when I shall join with him in getting it up.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think, in view of the action taken by the Senate yesterday, it ought to give consideration to this measure. If there are any points which can be debated in a short time, I think we ought to take it up. I must be away next week, and I should like to have action taken on it to-day. The measure is one which has been resting in the calendar for some time. I think the Senator from Ohio ought to point out wherein it differs from the other claim.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, what has taken place here illustrates the truth of what I was saying, that the joint resolution will lead to debate. Since the Senator has requested it, I think I can point out a very material difference. I do not desire to discuss the case which the Senate passed upon yesterday. The Senate acted upon that, and no doubt had good reasons for its action; but there is a very important difference, as I see it, between these two cases; and I have read the reports rather carefully. In the case which was acted upon yesterday everything that was done was done at the suggestion of the Government; at any rate, at the request of those who represented themselves to be the authorized agents of the Government. I do not so read the history of this case.

No one in any way questions the propriety of the Senator's interest in the matter, nor his earnestness in undertaking to secure action upon it, but this claim proceeds not from a sugar company but from a steamship company which was undertaking to make a profit out of this transaction. There is nothing criminal about it, and I do not claim that there is, but I do claim that the two cases rest upon entirely different bases. If the Senate wants to remain in session to discuss the joint resolution, I have no objection. I objected to its consideration once, when the Senator from New Jersey was not here, and I do not desire to object to it now.

Mr. KING. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will not press it. If so, I shall be compelled to call for a quorum.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will let it go over, but I simply say to the Senator from Ohio that I challenge his statement that every agency of the Government was not employed that was employed in the case of the American Trading Co. to urge and induce this concern to import the sugar. The Senator makes a general statement, but he does not point out the particular instances.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator did not understand me. I said that so far as the case we passed upon yesterday was concerned——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask that the joint resolution may go to the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is on the calendar.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I only hope that when the Senator calls this matter up again he will be able to furnish us with the names of some of the people who made fortunes out of sugar who paid any of it back to the Government.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not understand the Senator's statement, and as it is quite important I should like to have it clear.

Mr. FLETCHER. When we take the matter up again, I hope the Senator can furnish the Senate with the names of some gentlemen who made fortunes out of sugar and paid some of it back to the Government.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not understand the Senator's statement at all.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON, late a Representative from the State of California, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolutions just received from the House of Representatives.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions of the House, which will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
December 16, 1921.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON, a Representative from the State of California.

Resolved, That a committee of 18 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I submit the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask for their adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 197) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON, late a Representative from the State of California.

Resolved, That a committee of eight Senators be appointed by the Vice President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives, and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed as the committee under the second resolution, Mr. SHORTRIDGE, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. STANFIELD, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. WALSH of Montana, and Mr. PITTMAN.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being under the order previously made, until Monday, December 19, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, December 16, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, through mercy divine we are still treading our way through the wondering paths of Thy providence. Thy fatherhood is the overarching and the undergirding reality of all our hopes. O hear us as we renew our vows at Thy footstool. Come near us while we breathe our prayer. Have mercy upon us; pity us in our weakness; restrain us in our tendencies and hold us back when the way is unsafe. Another light has been extinguished; another star has died out and it is dark. O God, only Thy mercy can reach our estate. Be Thou the refuge of our souls and may we hide ourselves in Thee. Remove the veil and let Thy face shine through upon the loved ones so far away. May they hear Thy voice in the fate of their distance, in the solitude of their loneliness, in the agony of their tears, and in the darkness of the silent tomb. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ELSTON.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound regret and deep sorrow that I desire to announce to my colleagues the passing of the late JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON, of Berkeley, Alameda County, the sixth district of California. At some future time I shall ask that a day be set aside for memorial exercises on his life, character, and public service. In the meantime I desire to offer the following resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 250.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of the Hon. JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON, a Representative from the State of California.

Resolved, That a committee of 18 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Accordingly at 12 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m. the House adjourned until Saturday, December 17, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

423. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting number of claims filed by contractors for post offices and other buildings and works under the supervision of the Treasury Department; to the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings.

424. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a list of disbursing officers of the Navy who have been relieved of losses under the provisions of the act approved July 11, 1919, to and including June 30, 1921; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. LARSON of Minnesota: A bill (H. R. 9596) to authorize suits or actions against collectors or their successors in office in certain cases; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 9597) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs," approved May 16, 1918; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. CURRY: A bill (H. R. 9598) to provide for the consolidation or a redistribution of the powers and duties of certain executive departments of the Government of the United States relating to the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Territories.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

3323. By Mr. BEEDY: Resolutions by conference of Methodist Preachers and Laymen, Portland (Me.) district, urging international disarmament to a degree sufficient only as a police force; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

3324. By Mr. CULLEN: Resolution of the employees of the New York Navy Yard, relative to employees of navy yards in case of limitation of armaments; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

3325. By Mr. KISSEL: Petition of Kirkman & Son, of Brooklyn, N. Y.; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3326. Also, petition of Flatbush Chamber of Commerce (Inc.), of Brooklyn, N. Y.; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

3327. By Mr. JAMES: Resolutions adopted by the Calumet Chamber of Commerce, in favor of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence tidewater canal; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 17, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou in whose presence we find sweet repose, at the open door of this new day we turn again to Thee. We believe that Thou hast forgotten past failures and past sins. Then help us to forgive and forget the wrongs of yesterday. May every heart become the home of love and never the dwelling place of hate. Out of this day may there come new vision, greater outlook, broader understanding, and higher joys; but more than all things else, a deeper infolding of things divine, which are redemptive and final. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE TO ATTEND THE FUNERAL OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ELSTON.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following committee to attend the funeral of Mr. ELSTON:

Mr. KAHN, Mr. RAKER, Mr. CURRY, Mr. NOLAN, Mr. LEA of California, Mr. OSBORNE, Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. FREE, Mr. LINEBERGER, Mr. SWING, Mr. MONTAGUE, Mr. WINGO, Mr. KINCHELOE, Mr. MCARTHUR, Mr. MCCLINTIC, Mr. SNYDER, Mr. MICHENER, and Mr. WEBSTER.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2831. An act to authorize the State of Washington to construct a bridge across the Snake River at or near Central Ferry in or about section 9, township 13 north, range 40 east, Willamette meridian.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 4810) to authorize the incorporation of companies to promote trade in China, had insisted upon its amendments, and requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. BRANDEGEE, and Mr. WALSH of Montana as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1033) regulating the issuance of checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money within the District of Columbia, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. BALL, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. KING as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate resolution 197.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. JOHN ARTHUR ELSTON, late a Representative from the State of California.

Resolved, That a committee of eight Senators be appointed by the Vice President, to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to attend the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives, and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now adjourn.

Also that the Vice President had appointed, under the second resolution, Mr. SHORTRIDGE, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. STANFIELD, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. WALSH of Montana, and Mr. PITTMAN.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2802. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920; and

S. J. Res. 12. A joint resolution authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 13,902 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic.

S. J. Res. 142. A joint resolution to extend the time within which the special committee on the readjustment of the pay of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service may make its report to Congress.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate resolution 196.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be, and hereby is, requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 205) entitled "An act relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, bills and joint resolution of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 2831. An act to authorize the State of Washington to construct a bridge across the Snake River at or near Central Ferry, in or about section 9, township 13 north, range 40 east, Willamette meridian; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 2802. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes," approved May 22, 1920; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

S. J. Res. 12. Joint resolution authorizing the President to require the United States Sugar Equalization Board (Inc.) to take over and dispose of 13,902 tons of sugar imported from the Argentine Republic; to the Committee on Agriculture.

ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO COMMITTEES.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a resolution providing for elections to committees of the House and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. Before that, the Chair will lay before the House the following communication, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DECEMBER 15, 1921.

Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committees on Territories, Reform in the Civil Service, and Elections No. 1, to take effect immediately.

Very respectfully, yours, GEO. P. CODD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming presents a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 252.

Resolved, That A. PIATT ANDREW, Member of Congress from the sixth district of Massachusetts, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of standing committees of the House as follows: Coinage, Weights and Measures, Reform in the Civil Service, and Expenditures in the Department of Commerce; and

That CYRENUS COLE, Member of Congress from the fifth district of Iowa, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committees on Flood Control, Claims, and Expenditures in the Agriculture Department; and

That THOMAS S. CRAGO, Member of Congress from Pennsylvania, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committee on Military Affairs; and

That J. M. C. SMITH, Member of Congress from the third district of Michigan, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and

That GEORGE P. CODD, Member of Congress from the first district of Michigan, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF DECEMBER SALARIES OF EMPLOYEES OF CONGRESS.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I present a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois presents the following resolution, which the Clerk will report.

House joint resolution 234.

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 234) authorizing the payment of salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1921, and making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Be it resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives are hereby authorized and instructed to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police and the legislative drafting service and employees paid on vouchers under authority of resolutions, their respective salaries for the month of December, 1921, on the 20th day of said month.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15,000 to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, fiscal year 1922, namely, for miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say in connection with this $15,000 for the contingent fund of the House that there is only $5,000 at present in the contingent fund, and the bills to be paid for this month amount to $4,500, and the ordinary expenses that have been called for for the two funerals, one which has just taken place and the other about to take place, make necessary the granting of this additional fund in order that the bills may be paid.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself——

NO QUORUM—CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and fifty-eight Members, a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

RUSSIAN RELIEF.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia.

Pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, the rule provides that the time shall be controlled, one-half by those in favor of the bill and one-half by those opposed to it. I ask unanimous consent that the time in opposition to the bill be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and the time in favor of the bill by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that one-half of the time be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill referred to.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

Mr. TEMPLE. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have the bill read. It is a short bill, only 12 lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized, through such agency or agencies as he may designate, to purchase, transport, and distribute corn, seed grain, and preserved milk for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia and for spring planting in areas where seed grains have been exhausted. The President is hereby authorized to expend or cause to be expended, out of the funds of the United States Grain Corporation, a sum not exceeding $20,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the Chair kindly notify me when I have consumed 10 minutes?

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this bill is the result of the suggestion made by the President in his address to Congress on the 5th of December when we convened. He called attention particularly to the needs of the region in Russia in the district of the Volga, which is suffering from drought. There is a food shortage throughout Russia, and not only in that country but in many other parts of Europe and in Asia. In Russia the difficulty has come from several causes. The war disturbed Russia as it disturbed all the rest of the world.

In 1917 came the revolution, which brought peculiar disturbances upon that country, and in the fall of 1917 came the second revolution, overthrowing the Kerensky government and establishing the régime of the soviet system, with the long-continued and destructive civil war, which grew out of that revolution and attempts at counter-revolution.

Since that time matters have gone from bad to worse, and I may say it is well known that a considerable part of the difficulty, even in the farming regions of Russia, is the result of the system established by Lenin and Trotski. The farmer has no very great desire to raise crops that are taken from him without compensation. There was a falling off in 1918, in 1919, and in 1920; but in 1921 came an exceedingly severe drought, and in the richest agricultural region of Russia there has been practically a total failure of the crop.

Without attempting to spread attention over the whole of Russia or over the whole of the Volga district we might notice definite figures in regard to small areas.

In the commune of Schilling, to which our attention was called in the committee by Gov. Goodrich, of Indiana, who has just returned from a trip of investigation in that country, we find conditions that are appalling. The facts are interesting and the subject before the committee is important. I do not ask for a hearing for my own sake, but for the facts that I am going to present.

This small commune of Schilling has a population of 3,798 and an area that gives them about 3¾ acres per capita.

In 1919 the total grain crop of that commune or township—to compare it with a unit of approximately the same area in our own country—amounted to 37,950 poods, a pood being 36 pounds, more than a half bushel. Of these 37,950 poods the soviet government took 12,000 poods, or about one-third, without compensation.

The next year the farmers did not feel so much like sowing large crops. They would sow for their own needs, and the crops amounted to 30,533 poods as compared with 37,950 poods the year before.

The next year, 1921, there were sowed in that small commune 1,255 poods, or roughly 700 bushels, and the drought was such that the farmers did not get back even the amount of the seed that they had put into the ground.

Domestic animals in that commune decreased. In 1919 there were 1,223 horses. In 1920 there were 891. In 1921 there were 451.

The sheep in 1919 were 1,352; in 1920, 1,151; and in 1921, 424.

Of hogs in the same commune in 1919 there were 781; in 1920, 246; and in 1921, 58. The number of animals decreased because there is not food enough for the animals and for the population.

They are slaughtering draft horses, milch cows, and even their breeding stock in order that the owners may have food for immediate necessities. Even with these efforts the extraordinary deaths are numerous. Since July 1, 1921, to say nothing of the ordinary deaths in that commune, out of a total population of 3,800 people, there have been 25 deaths from cholera, 30 from typhus, and 45 from starvation.

That commune at the time of the visit of Gov. Goodrich had 1,146 children under 15 years of age. It is estimated that 800 of them will die of starvation before spring unless outside aid comes to their relief.

Dr. Vernon Kellogg told us the mode of dealing with these starving children. When the American Relief Administration went in there there were local committees which had been organized by the soviet authorities for such relief as they were attempting to give. The American Relief Administration would not use the soviet committees, but organized its own, so that everything would be under American control.

They have established kitchens, where some of the children are fed. They have not had sufficient supplies in any locality to feed all the starving children. They select to be fed those that are strong enough to give promise of possibility of living until spring. They do not waste food on those who are going to die anyway. If this bill passes, that sort of selection, which seems so heartless but which is a brutal necessity, will no longer be a necessity. If out of our comparative abundance we give what we can spare, we can save the lives not only of the people of this community but others—and I have given a microscopic view of one small area like this; everywhere it is the same.

The whole area of acute drought and famine is about 500 miles wide and 800 miles long, and the population is from 15,000,000 to 18,000,000. Nobody can foretell with accuracy the number who will die before another harvest, but as nearly as can be estimated the deaths will be from 7,000,000 to 9,000,000.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I am anxious to know how large an area this applies to; what is meant by Russia.

Mr. TEMPLE. The estimates I have given are for the Volga Valley only where the drought has come. We are endeavoring to make a distinction between conditions brought on by misgovernment of Russia, by the errors and crimes of men, and those that arise from an "act of God."

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Would not the condition of the people under the term "Russia" include the whole ancient empire?

Mr. TEMPLE. Aid could be given throughout Russia, so far as the bill is concerned, but I believe the purpose is to limit the work to the Volga district, as suggested by the President in his message. This district is already covered by the American Relief Administration or the Quakers' relief work, or it is being organized by these agencies as rapidly as possible.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I would like to ask the gentleman if that is the definite purpose?

Mr. TEMPLE. There is nothing in the bill that limits the relief work to the Volga district, as the gentleman will observe by reading it.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the administrators under the act follow that?

Mr. TEMPLE. If the gentleman will allow me to go on he will get the point of view.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has occupied 10 minutes.

Mr. TEMPLE. I have only one hour and I have promised more time than I really have, and I do not wish to take the time away from any other man. However, I will take five minutes more.

There is a physical limit to the possibilities of relief. The transportation systems of Russia are so out of joint that there is a limit to the quantity of food that can be delivered. Russian authorities claim to have 440,000 freight cars, but authentic sources of information indicate that they have in good repair only about 20,000. There are two railroads that will reach the Volga district, one coming in from Riga and the other from Novorissisk, on the Black Sea, though it is a little uncertain whether the line from the Black Sea has been repaired since the Wrangel invasion. The testimony coming to our committee is that the total capacity of the two railroads at the present time would be about 100,000 tons a month, or about 22,000,000 bushels in the course of the winter before the new harvest comes in. There is that physical limitation to the possibilities of getting the grain to them. We can not control conditions in Russia, and if we attempt to go all over Russia we will do no good at all. But if we distinguish between that part of Russia that is in distress because of misgovernment and that part that is in distress because of the drought, which no government could prevent, and confine ourselves to the district where the work is all organized, where the American Relief Administration and the Friends Relief are organized and at work, we can actually do some good. But if we spread it out over Russia we will have to have more than $20,000,000 and still be hampered by limitation of transportation. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman give the amount raised by private donations?

Mr. TEMPLE. My time is exhausted. That may be brought out later.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied if this printed report were read by each and every Member this bill would pass unanimously. The evidence that has been presented to the Committee on Foreign Affairs by former Gov. Goodrich, of Indiana; Dr. Vernon Kellogg, secretary of the National Research Council; and Secretary Hoover, of the Department of Commerce, concerning the present terrible conditions existing in the Volga Valley in Russia are of such character that I feel there is not a person within the United States who would refuse to cooperate in every way to help in securing the passage of this meritorious and deserving relief measure.

The conditions are really indescribable. There are millions of men, women, and children who are now starving. The situation is such that it can not be ignored by any man—it matters not how heartless he may be. Former Gov. Goodrich has explained that there are upward of 20,000,000 people in the Volga district who are actually starving, and unless immediate aid is given them they will perish. It is hoped by this relief some may be saved, and it is therefore imperative this legislation be passed without delay. Some Members are under the impression that perhaps this aid will be sent into the large districts or cities. I wish to correct that impression by saying that the proposed aid is contemplated to reach the agricultural districts, where it has been shown the suffering is greatest.

I feel that the American people will gladly approve our action, especially when it means, as has been stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, a gift that will amount to a tax of about 20 cents per person. I do not doubt that every man, woman, and child in our country would be ready and willing to contribute five times as much as that sum to save at least one child, not to say anything about giving salvation to a million children. There is no one so poor in this country who is not ready to make that contribution to save the life of a child, even if it is the child of a Russian peasant.

Mr. Chairman, the evidence given by former Gov. Goodrich and others is to the effect that every ounce of foodstuff that is being sent now, which is being distributed under the direction of the American relief organization, reaches the people it is intended to reach. Oh, there may be a question in the minds of some who are not conversant with the conditions there, who may feel that because of the bolshevik government we should not aid these unfortunate people by giving them food. However, the fact is borne out by every person who has appeared before the Foreign Affairs Committee that the present government, it matters not how bad it is, is aiding to its full extent in cooperating with the relief committee in expediting the shipments and in the distribution and care of the supplies.

Not only that, but they have also assured the committee, and I hope I am not violating any confidence when I state this, that the present government is ready and willing to turn over to our committee or to this committee every dollar or ounce of American gold it has in its treasury, amounting to five or six million dollars, which would be added to the sum proposed in the bill before us, in order that they may purchase enough corn, wheat, and condensed milk to save these unfortunate people.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, how many days before you can make this relief felt?

Mr. SABATH. Immediately, and I will state why. The moment the American Relief Committee knows that this measure has been agreed to they will cable over there and those who have a little on hand will gladly share with those that have nothing to eat now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield me two minutes more?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Members of the House will have time to read the report. It has been stated that this relief will also afford relief to millions of our own people. Such statements I am sure have not been made with the intent to sway sentiment, but for the purpose of bringing home actual truth to the membership that, though it may appear we are asked to give a large sum of money, it will not only come back to us a thousandfold but will create a greater demand for our surplus products and grains that the farmer has found impossible to sell anywhere near the cost of production. The sending of 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 bushels of corn, of 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 bushels of wheat for seedling purposes, together with condensed or powdered milk, will materially help in saving the lives of thousands upon thousands of the unfortunates in Russia. It will also stimulate the export of these commodities and thus afford relief not only to the suffering farmer but to the entire Nation as well. When farmers are prosperous, when farmers have money, they buy and spend, and therefore a demand is created for manufactured articles, and such demand means stimulated business.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention particularly to the report of the members of the relief committee who testified before the Foreign Affairs Committee. They are men who are holding, or who have held, high responsible positions in our Government. Despite the reports which have emanated from various sources in the past few months that the bolshevik government has taken away from the people supplies of grains and foodstuffs, this committee of representative Americans report to the contrary; in fact, they claim there was nothing to take away from the people.

The present famine, it is stated, is due to the drought in 1919, which reduced the harvest to 50 per cent of that of the former year; in 1920 the production was about 35 per cent and in 1921 there was practically no harvest, and in some localities the production was hardly enough for seeding for planting next spring.

Mr. Chairman, I again appeal to the membership of this House to consider the report of the special representatives of the committee which have investigated the situation. I hope, when they have read the report, that they will express their confidence in these unbiased and uninterested American representatives to the end that they will believe as I do—that it is the duty of the representatives of the greatest and richest country in the world to save from misery—yes, the starving of millions of these unfortunate people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Under leave to extend my remarks, I desire to insert extracts from the statements made by former Gov. Goodrich, of Indiana, before the Committee on Foreign Affairs. His comment and close observation as to actual conditions, I feel, will apprise the people of our Nation as to the dire need of relieving the sufferings of millions of unfortunate peoples.

[From the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, December 13 and 14, 1921.]

STATEMENT OF HON. JAMES P. GOODRICH, FORMERLY GOVERNOR OF INDIANA.

* * * * * * *

Mr. GOODRICH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the chairman stated that I had just returned from Russia. I spent about two months there, going through the famine districts. I first went to Moscow, then out to Samara and down the Volga River to Saratov, then on down the river 30 miles below Saratov. I drove out in that lower Volga district to 16 different communes, going into the various communal houses, examining their records, going through their grain houses, collecting all the statistics that I could get, to ascertain the true situation. I afterwards went out to Kazan, and from Moscow to Petrograd, covering pretty much all of the so-called famine district except the extreme lower part, and, perhaps, a part of it at the north end extending out toward the Siberian frontier.

* * * * * * *

In going into the German and Russian communes and the Russian communes in the lower Volga I found an appalling situation. On going into the cities and observing these great, strong, round-faced, red-cheeked men and women in the bazaars and on the streets, one would think there was no famine in that country, but when you go into the community houses where deserted children and orphans are assembled, go out into the communes and into the communal homes where they have gotten them together, you realize how terrific the situation is, especially when you get down to the brass-tack facts and see the small amount of food that they have there upon which they must depend to sustain life for the next six months.

We visited the communal home, where orphans and abandoned children are collected from the near-by communes. We found 145 children in this home. They are first taken into one part of the home, deloused, and given a bath. These children when they come in are dirty, ragged, living skeletons, with a helpless, hungry look in their faces, and take little or no interest in their surroundings. They seem more like an animal that has been shot to death and crawled off in the brush to die. It was a terrific sight for an American to witness. After the children are cleaned up they are given rough cotton clothing, very scant and light, most of them without shoes and stockings, although the thermometer on the day we were there was 28° below zero and the home in which they were quartered not very well heated on account of the shortage of fuel.

I found in this commune 41 houses which had been abandoned. The owners had either died or left the commune. The roofs had been torn off these houses to get wood for fuel. Fuel is very scarce in that country, for the lower Volga is almost as devoid of timber as western Kansas. They burn manure, which is made up in small blocks, and some peat. On the outskirts of this commune, Houk, as we passed a small shed near one of the abandoned houses we found in it two little girls, 10 and 12 years of age. They came out of the shed holding their arms close about them, shivering and crying in the cold, bitter wind blowing the snow across the commune that day. I inquired as to their trouble. They said that their father and mother and two of their brothers had died of cholera and starvation the week before.

* * * * * * *

I tell you these things in order that you might get some idea as to the things that are happening in Russia. I went into a peasant's home in the Province of Saratov, where a man and woman were lying at the point of death. They had had nothing to eat for over a week; no money to get anything with. They said, "There is no hope for us; we are too weak to get out; we shall die, but it does not matter." Many stories of this kind are being told you of the things we saw and heard throughout the famine district. It is difficult for Americans to understand this situation. In these same communes where the terrible conditions I relate occur, a great majority of the people have sufficient to eat and are at this time living in comparative comfort.

* * * * * * *

The soviet government, whatever you may say or think about it, is cooperating to the fullest extent. It will not permit a pound of the food to be diverted, but is carrying it to its destination without loss. It is the death penalty for anyone to steal food from the American Relief Administration. I heard of a man tell the American Relief Administration officers at Saratov that if anyone stole anything not to fool with them but to report them, and that anyone found stealing American food would be stood up against a wall and shot. There has been a remarkably small amount of food lost. They have an organization down in all those places.

Mr. Chairman, I also insert extracts of statements of Dr. Vernon Kellogg, permanent secretary of the National Research Council, who returned to the United States October last after spending a month in observation of conditions in Russia:

* * * * * * *

The situation is simply incredible to one who has not seen it; indescribable even by one who has seen it. I have seen nothing like it in my six years of experience in the food shortage regions of Europe. In a given spot in Poland, for example, 200 children might be found in as bad condition, but that condition is the rule all through the Volga region, a region of great extent, with a vast population. There are at least 15,000,000 people in the famine region of the Volga, while around that famine region is a food-shortage region including 15,000,000 more. Senator Burton, there is not food enough in the surrounding region to keep the people alive, let alone any to send into the famine regions.

As Gov. Goodrich has pointed out, there is an agricultural breakdown in Russia which has been becoming more and more serious for the last two or three years. And then on top of this has come a terrible drought, extending over one of the three chief grain-producing regions of Russia, a region which under normal conditions produces food for Moscow and the industrial regions and even for export to other parts of Europe. That food is gone. It is simply a catastrophe.

The soviet government has tried to bring in food. It has been able to bring in only a very small amount. It has tried to bring in seed. I was there when the Government seed trains came down into the Volga and the seeds were parceled out to the farmers. The farmers took the seed and planted it. I talked with many of them and with many of the officials, and there was no one more optimistic in his statement than to say that they had more than one-fifth of their normal needs for planting. Still they can seed more thinly and thus seed more than one-fifth of a crop.

But the individual situation is that millions of people are out of food. I am confident I am telling the truth when I say millions of people are doomed to die in the Volga region unless relief on a large scale comes from outside. The American Relief Administration has paid attention simply to children. We have but limited resources. We do not want to talk politics. But when it comes to the saving of children it is difficult for me to make a distinction between starving children of Belgium, Poland, Russia, or even of America, if that catastrophe should come to us. The children have had nothing to do with the causes of the famine or the present conditions of Russia.

The CHAIRMAN. How do you distinguish so far as the children are concerned there? Is there some age limit?

Dr. KELLOGG. It would carry us far afield if I attempted to describe the system of the American Relief Administration. But we limit the children to those from birth to 15 years. We set up in whatever region in which we are working local committees with some doctors as members. The committees are selected by us and not by the soviet government. Say that here are five candidates and we can feed but one; we pick out that one of the five that most needs the food. Not the one in the worst condition, necessarily, but the one that can be saved and kept alive and grow strong. We have to-day that system in Russia, as we have had it in Poland and other countries all the time. The officials of the Tartar Republic said, "We have a committee in each of the various towns and villages of the Province, because there is a certain amount of relief work going on all the time. We will just turn over these committees to you." We said, "No; we will set up our own committees. We Americans are responsible to the American people that this food goes only to the children we select, and we must know and must control that work absolutely." It is known in Russia to-day that it is American work.

The soviet government gives us transportation and guards, and so far there has not been a single thing in the work that would indicate danger to the food. We control that food absolutely, the use of every ton of it. There is an American placard on every car of food, on every warehouse, on every motor truck, on every kitchen and dining room.

Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Department of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, also appeared before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I desire to insert the following extract from his remarks:

* * * * * * *

Secretary HOOVER. I feel that public charity will do everything that charity can do, but these are times when one can not rightly summon much public charity for use abroad from the American people. There are a great many committees working throughout the country under great difficulty, but with a great deal of energy. I do not believe, however, that the total collections since August of the entire group amount to $750,000. Public charity is to be not an avenue through which this problem can be solved.

Some question has been raised in here and elsewhere as to our own economic situation not warranting our extending relief abroad. I would like to discuss it from two points of view. The first is whether we can afford it. In a general way this country is spending something like $1,000,000,000 a year on tobacco, cosmetics, ice cream, and other nonessentials of that character. It does not look to be a very great strain on the population to take $20,000,000 for a purpose of this kind. If our own people suffer we surely possess also the resources to care for them. It has also another economic bearing. The food supplies that we wish to take to Russia are all in surplus in the United States, and are without a market in any quarter of the globe.

We are to-day feeding milk to our hogs; burning corn under our boilers. From an economic point of view there is no loss to America in exporting those foodstuffs for relief purposes. If it is undertaken by the Government it means, it is true, that we transfer the burden of the loss from the farmers to the taxpayer, but there is now economic loss to us as a Nation, and the farmer also bears part of the burden.

Mr. Chairman. I also desire to insert part of the remarks of Mr. Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, who appealed for the passage of this relief legislation:

* * * * * * *

What I wanted to be sure about before I expressed a word in favor of this legislation now pending here before the committee is that I wanted to know whether if the American Congress shall out of the pockets of the people expend $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 for the relief of the famine-stricken people of Russia, whether it would give aid and comfort to the present Government of Russia, and I wanted to know whether they would be in absolute control of this fund and this relief by the American Relief Administration, that it would not be taken over to help the existing régime in Russia called the soviet government, and whether it would tranquillize the people to such an extent as that they would help the present régime as final.

Mr. CONNALLY. You heard the testimony of this gentleman that on the other hand, this government, instead of being a government of vultures, was aiding and helping to distribute this food, and it actually made contributions to other Provinces. Does that disabuse your mind of any impression that there would be any confiscation of that property by the government?

Mr. GOMPERS. I made the statement that I have just made to explain the position which I occupy and think my mind was disabused before I came here this afternoon. I came here to add my appeal to that which has already been made before this committee. I want that your committee shall know, and I want that those whom I had the honor in part to represent to know, that I am here expressing their views and having been satisfied with the appropriation by the Government of funds for the purpose of this relief, in as far as I can add anything I shall be very pleased to appeal to you to pass this legislation.

Mr. Chairman, to relieve the fear that may be in the minds of some that the relief may not reach the people of Russia, I insert the agreement entered into between the American Relief Administration and soviet authorities.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN AMERICAN RELIEF ADMINISTRATION AND SOVIET AUTHORITIES RE RUSSIAN RELIEF—PREAMBLE.

Whereas famine condition exists in Russia; and

Whereas Gorky with sanction soviets has applied through Hoover to American people for charitable assistance to the starving and sick people of Russia, more particularly the children; and

Whereas Hoover and American people have read with great sympathy this appeal on the part Russian people in their distress and are desirous solely for humanitarian reasons of coming to their assistance:

Therefore it is agreed between American Relief Administration, unofficial volunteer American charitable organization under chairmanship of Hoover, hereinafter called American Relief Administration, and Russian Socialist Federal Soviet Republic, called soviet authorities, that the American Relief Administration will extend such assistance to Russian people as within its power, subject acceptance and fulfillment following condition on part soviet authorities, who hereby declare that there is need of this assistance on part of American Relief Administration:

1. The soviets agree that the American Relief Administration may bring in such personnel as it thinks necessary for the efficient administration of relief, and that it be assured of full liberty and protection in Russia. Non-Americans and Americans detained in Soviet Russia since 1917 are to be subject to the approval of the soviet authorities.

2. The relief administration personnel shall have all facilities for entry to and exit from Russia and liberty of movement therein on official business.

3. The relief administration shall have complete freedom in the selection of local personnel.

4. It shall deliver supplies at a Russian port or the nearest practical adjacent point, and the soviet authorities are to bear all further charges for the same.

5. The soviet will supply storage base points and the transportation needed for supplies.

6. The soviets will give the relief administration the same priority in this as that accorded to their own relief and will furnish adequate guards for convoys, etc.

7. The soviets will allow the free import and reexport of all relief administration supplies whatever and will guarantee them against requisition.

8. Relief supplies are to be devoted to the sick and children only as designated by the relief administration, and are to remain the property of the administration until consumed. The distribution is to be in the name of the administration.

9. No individual receiving relief-administration rations is to be deprived of a share of such local supplies as are given to the rest of the population by soviet agencies.

10. The soviets guarantee to take steps to insure that supplies do not go to the general population, the army, navy, or Government employees, but only as designated by the relief administration.

11. The soviets undertake to reimburse in American dollars or replace in kind any supplies that are misused.

12. The relief administration may set up necessary organizations for relief free from Government or other interference. The central and local soviet authorities have the right of representation therein.

13. The soviet authorities are to provide necessary premises for kitchens, dispensaries, and, as far as possible, hospitals and necessary fuel for cooking in the same, and the distribution and feeding equipments. The soviets will bear the total cost of local relief administration, food preparation, distribution, etc., and of local medical personnel and assistance needed to administer relief. They will give free rail, motor, and water transportation for the movement of relief supplies, and such personnel as is necessary efficiently to control the relief operations. They will assign railroad cars to the relief personnel for moving, living, etc.

14. The relief administration is authorized to take such measures as are necessary to insure sanitary conditions, water supply, etc., in the area where epidemics are raging.

15. The soviets will supply offices, garages, and storerooms free of charge, with light, heat, and water for the same, and residential quarters for the personnel, all free from requisition. Examination of all or any of said premises can only be made with the knowledge of and in the presence of the chief of relief operations or his representative, and then in case of a so-called flagrant delit.

16. The soviets guarantee the freedom and priority of the relief administration communications, without cost, by means of the existing radio, telegraph, telephone, postal, and courier services, and, if available, the use of private telephones and telegraphs will be permitted for the relief administration's use (subject to consent of the authorities).

17. The American personnel, representatives, and couriers will receive the customary diplomatic privileges at the frontiers.

18. The soviets will supply, free of cost, gasoline oil for motor transport.

19. The soviets will give baggage and supplies free transportation.

20. The soviets will allow the importation and reexport, free of duty (requisition), of the necessary commissary (transport and office) supplies.

21. The soviets will acquaint the Russian people with the aims and methods of the American Relief Association work to facilitate rapid development of its efficiency and will assist and facilitate supplying the American people with reliable and nonpolitical information as to the existing conditions and the progress of the relief work as an aid in the development of financial support for the work in America.

22. The soviets will bear all the expenses of relief operations other than the cost of relief supplies and the direct expenses of the American control and payment of the American personnel, and in general will give the relief administration all the assistance in their power.

23. (NOTE.—Deals with questions of warehousing, which are to be settled later.)

24. The American Relief Administration agrees to organize as quickly as possible, within the limits of its resources, to supply food, clothing, and medical help, particularly to children and sick persons within age limits to be decided by American Relief Administration.

25. Relief is to be distributed without regard to race, religion, social, or political status.

26. The personnel in Russia will confine itself strictly to the administration of relief and will engage in no political or commercial activities whatever. Any person contravening this engagement shall be withdrawn or discharged on the request of the central soviet authorities. The central soviet authorities will submit to the chief office of the American Relief Administration the reasons for this request and the evidence in their possession.

27. The American Relief Administration will carry on relief operations where it finds relief can be administered most effectively and will secure the best results. Its principal object is to bring relief to the famine-stricken areas.

28. (Missing.)

29. The relief administration will import no alcohol in its relief supplies.

30. The American Relief Administration will agree to permit customs inspection of its imported relief supplies at mutually agreed upon points.

CANCELLATION CLAUSES.

The soviet authorities having agreed to release all Americans detained in Russia and facilitate the departure from Russia of all Americans so desiring, the relief administration reserves the right to suspend temporarily or terminate relief operations in Russia in the event of failure by the soviet authorities to comply with this primary condition or any other points of the contract. The soviet authorities equally reserve the right to cancel the agreement in the case of nonfulfillment by the American Relief Administration.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, everyone in this Chamber has sympathy for those who have met with such dire and distressing conditions as have been depicted here, not only in Russia, but in Armenia, in Poland, in Germany, in China, in India, wherever there may be distress; but in voting for this relief measure we are launching ourselves into unknown seas, and we can not tell where our course will take us. If we had responded to similar calls for relief in the last 20 years we would have appropriated a billion dollars. I remember that in 1916, after the German drive across Poland, which left death, desolation, and starvation in its train, there was a demand on Congress to appropriate $500,000,000 to relieve that distress—conditions equally distressful with those in this instance. Where are we to stop if we are to adopt a policy of this kind? Government appropriations will not invite private subscriptions as have been going on in this and many other appealing cases, and once you adopt this policy you immediately check private contributions, and the call will come always to the National Government to have Congress reach into the Treasury and vote the necessary funds. Propagandists will be at work and the House and the Senate will yield to their demands.

Further, I deny that we have any authority by reason of the mandate given to us to vote other people's money for the relief of people in distress abroad.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not now. Never before in the history of our Government have we voted money under such conditions where there has been relief first given by private subscription. There are isolated situations which might have arisen, like that at Messina, where there was no time to grant relief through private appeal. Even during the war period, when the farmers of North Dakota were suffering because of drought, we refused to give them money for seed. Every cent of money that we voted was loaned upon the express condition that it would be returned.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not now. Here we are attempting to adopt a policy of appropriating other people's money. If people are not inclined to give money by private donation, where is the authority in Congress to take their money and give it? I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. During the war period at the request of President Wilson——

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, that was under war conditions. It was to help distressed peoples as an aid in our war purposes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Let me ask the question, at least.

Mr. STAFFORD. I decline to yield further. Under war conditions, when there was no opportunity for private relief. During hat same war period, before we got into the war, the Rockefeller Foundation asked us for a contribution of $500,000,000, to be matched by an equal amount by them, to relieve the distress and famine in Poland occasioned by the German drive. Yet the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the members of that committee declined to grant any governmental aid, as it was beyond proper governmental function. Can not Members here see that once we launch on a policy of rendering aid to those in foreign countries who are in distress there will be no stop whatsoever? You will not be able to discriminate. No one will be able to stop the demands and we will be obliged to vote money as called for. It is a dangerous precedent that we are setting, and the rule of precedent here is so strong that once it is established there will be no end to it.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain how much will be necessary if we adopt a like course of relief for all of this famine in the world, to feed the famished people who have not necessary seed in other places in the world besides Russia?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Did not we send 5,000,000 barrels of flour through Julius Barnes to Europe——

Mr. STAFFORD. That was during the war.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. And did not we send $2,000,000 to the earthquake suffers at Messina.

Mr. STAFFORD. I decline to yield further. That was at a time when there was no time to raise money by private subscriptions. This is entirely different, because nothing has been shown in the hearings to the effect that the people of America are not willing to grant still more if they are asked. Once you grant this appropriation, twice the amount originally asked, the drive for private funds will be unavailing. There is going to be suffering in this country during the coming winter. Are we to deny relief at home and vote the people's money to the relief of those who are suffering abroad because of the bad government of their own making?

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, it might appear from the fact that a Member on our side of the House controls the time in opposition to this bill that we are opposed to it. Such, however, is not the case. When this bill came before the Committee on Foreign Affairs every member of that committee favored the passage of the bill with the exception of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], who controls the time, so that the bill comes from the committee almost by a unanimous vote. We are appropriating this money, it is true, but this fund is payable, if you will notice, from the United States Grain Corporation fund. We voted $100,000,000 some year or two ago——

Mr. SABATH. One billion dollars.

Mr. LINTHICUM. True, $1,000,000,000 to the United States Grain Corporation.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will.

Mr. MACGREGOR. What is in my mind is the constitutionality of our action. Have we any right to appropriate the money of the people of the United States for foreign purposes?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Well, if the gentleman raises that question, he might raise it in respect to a great many matters which come before this House on many of the appropriations which we make. We have long since passed the point where we merely appropriate for the expenses of the Government. We have appropriated on many occasions for other than the expenses of the Government. It could well come under the general welfare clause and well be held constitutional.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have only five minutes. Out of that investment in the United States Grain Corporation which was appropriated, $65,000,000 have remained as profits of the enterprise, and this $20,000,000 will be paid out of that $65,000,000. The people of Russia are starving. Sickness and pestilence invaded the lower Volga Valley. Shall we with our great abundance refuse them help? I do not look upon it from any mercenary standpoint, but the fact remains that the Russians held back the Germans when the war was at its height, and they lost 4,000,000 in dead and 10,000,000 wounded. The mere fact that they are starving and we can help them ought to be sufficient to command every vote in the House of Representatives. I do not believe that Providence has given to this great country of ours all the wealth and prosperity which it has enjoyed in years past so as to enable us to pile up millions upon millions in wealth for nothing more than our own use and for war purposes and purposes of enjoyment. I believe that we are somewhat to act as trustees to help the balance of the world wherever starvation and pestilence prevail, wherever misery and want stalk the earth, and wherever we can do so without injury to ourselves. Twenty million dollars might seem a very large sum, but when you distribute it among those people of this section of Russia, when you buy them seed corn and seed wheat that they may help themselves, the $20,000,000 will soon be exhausted. I wish to say as a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee that I voice the sentiment and vote of every Democrat on that committee, and all helped in the favorable report of this bill by the committee with the one exception I have named.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to yield first to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I simply wish to say that I have the greatest sympathy for people who are suffering everywhere, but I experience the same difficulty as indicated by the interrogatory of the gentleman awhile ago, and that is a misgiving as to whether we have any power to enact this legislation. If the power exists, it must be found in the Constitution, affirmatively expressed. Now, obviously the gentleman can not find the power anywhere unless in the common defense and general welfare clause, if it can be found at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield the gentleman three additional minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I hope the gentleman will not make a constitutional speech in my time.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. But the common defense and general welfare provision is confined to the defense and welfare of the United States and does not entitle us to appropriate money for the benefit of the people of foreign nations. That is the very point made by Storey in a quotation from Storey used by Judge Charles E. Hughes in a case argued by the latter not long ago in the Supreme Court. How is the gentleman going to justify this measure as a valid exercise of power?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I think if the gentleman will refer to the general welfare clause he will find it can very well come under that. It is for the general welfare of this country that we help the starving people of Russia. I think with the friendliness those people have always shown toward America we are acting right at this time and need not hesitate for constitutional conjectures or otherwise from acting.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I will.

Mr. LAYTON. What I would like to understand, and there seems to be a great deal of discrepancy in the statements made, is if this $20,000,000 is largely going to be used for seed wheat and other seed purposes, what is to keep these people from starving to death before they could plant it and reap it?

Mr. COCKRAN. Only part is for immediate relief.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman from Delaware that originally the bill was for ten million. That is for seed wheat and corn for the Russians, and that is in accordance with the President's suggestion, but the committee thought the amount insufficient and increased the sum to $20,000,000 to carry wheat and corn for food and seed purposes and condensed milk to help them at this time. This will enable the relief committee to relieve distress and starvation now and provide seed for next season so they may help themselves.

Mr. LAYTON. And immediate relief?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Immediate relief will thus be provided through the relief committee.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] seemed to indicate by his question that under the general-welfare clause expenditures from the Public Treasury must be in the United States. Now, suppose——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I wish the gentleman from Wisconsin would make his question very short.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman from Maryland think if there were cholera or smallpox or famine across our boundary line in Mexico, right next to our southern States, that it would be a legitimate expenditure of the public funds under the welfare clause of the Constitution to send to the Mexican Government money to assist in doing away with that pestilence just across that imaginary boundary?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and also to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], that we have already appropriated money to be used in Mexico to stop the boll weevil in that country and prevent it from coming into the United States.

Mr. ROGERS. And we also contributed liberally at the time of the Messina earthquake in the island of Sicily.

Mr. LINTHICUM. There are many precedents. I do not want to take up much time, but I do hope you will pass this bill in the spirit in which it is intended. It ought to pass this House by unanimous vote. We ought to do it in the right way, so that the people over there may see that we, who have always enjoyed the friendship of the Russian people, are in favor of helping them and are unanimous and do it wholeheartedly. [Applause.]

The poet has truthfully said:

That which I had I lost.
That which I spent is gone.
That which I gave I have.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has again expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE] such time as he may require, even if it should exceed five minutes.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States has very nobly expressed the sympathy of the whole American people with the unfortunate people of Russia, and it is a hard task, indeed, within 10 days of Christmas, to get up here and protest against the relief being given in the way in which the head of the American Nation has asked that it be given.

I want to say, in the first place, that my opposition to this measure is not founded upon my sincere conviction that the Russian misfortune is largely the fault of the most cruel, stupid, and execrable government the world has ever seen. That patriotic statesman and wise counselor of his fellow citizens, the Hon. Elihu Root, in his admirable lecture on "The task assumed or inherited by the governing body in a democracy," says, "If government be bad, ruin comes to all. If it be good, success comes according to capacity and courage. The fairest and most fertile parts of the earth have for centuries been wilderness and desolation because of bad government. Not only lands capable of supporting multitudes in comfort and prosperity, but lands which have actually done so in the past are to-day filled with vice and squalor, with ignorance and poverty, because of bad government, while under good government comfort and industry flourish on the most sterile soil and under the most rigorous climate." Russia has had famines before, but she has had a sufficiently stable and effective government, even under the Czar, to survive them. This famine is not primarily the act of God. It is primarily the act of His enemies in inflicting upon the unhappy people of Russia the very worst government in human history.

Nevertheless, if it is right for us to appropriate this money, I do not think these considerations should withhold it. A people with more of the innate qualities which make a self-governing nation would probably have found a way to rid their 150,000,000 of the tyranny of 600,000 communists, but I am not urging that as a ground for refusing this appropriation. Indeed, for such relief as we can properly extend, the weakness and inexperience of these people is a reason in its favor and not a reason against it.

Nor do I oppose this appropriation because I believe it will be additional ammunition for the cause of bolshevism, though that is my firm belief. The other day there appeared before our Committee on Immigration and Naturalization a gentleman who has just returned from a trip to Russia, where he interviewed many people, including a number of officials of the soviet government. He left Riga just at the time when a very distinguished legislative officer of this Government was leaving Russia after an extended visit there. He said that the people of Russia were convinced that this Member of the National Legislature of the United States was a communist; that the communist parties of America, while perhaps not a majority, were powerful enough to materially influence American public opinion and American governmental action; that this visit was a proof of such influence; and that if confirmation were needed it was amply furnished by the arrival of the Hoover American relief just about the time of the departure of this American legislator. No amount of argument, said our witness, would convince these Russians that the communist parties in America were not behind this action. It was perfectly evident that they were influential enough to compel the United States to assist their bolshevist brethren in Russia, and evident also that the cause of communism was spreading throughout the world, and particularly in the United States. Of course, in the mouths of bolshevist propagandists, this appropriation will be further and conclusive proof to the same effect.

But while I want my colleagues to know this, it is not my reason for refusing to support this bill. I readily concede that we should not refuse to do an act which it is right for us to do merely because our motives will almost certainly be misconstrued, even if that misconstruction is done purposely and with the intent of injuring us.

My reason is an entirely different one and is directed solely against the form of this relief. I would be glad to see $20,000,000 or a much larger sum raised by private charity for this purpose, and I will contribute to such a fund to the full extent of my ability. But this bill proposes to appropriate public moneys for this purpose.

The public moneys of the United States are raised by taxation. Taxation is a compulsory process. Your property can be sold at forced sale without your consent if necessary to pay your taxes. In the last analysis it means simply this, that the property of a citizen of the United States could be sold to send assistance to people of another country. Whether this is constitutional or not—and personally I do not believe that it is—I do not think we ought to do it. I hope that the response of the American people will be overwhelmingly generous toward this most deserving charity, but I believe that response should be a voluntary and not a compulsory response.

The case appeals most piteously for voluntary relief, and that appeal is all the stronger because of the long-standing friendship between the two peoples, a friendship most effectively manifested by Russia at the time of our Civil War; but, as was most appropriately said on this floor a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], the United States is a trustee. Now, the obligations of a trustee are very strict. You can give away your own property, but a trustee can not give away the property of his beneficiary. I am very sure that no man in this House would object to paying his share of the amount carried in this bill, but the man who does object would be entirely within his rights. His property is subject to taxation and to sale for taxes on the theory that it is liable, to any extent that may be required, for the support of the United States, not on the theory that it is liable for the support of other peoples, no matter how strong the appeal which they make to our hearts. Foreign charity is the field for free money and not for tax money. The most deserving foreign charity is not the proper field for relief by taxation of American citizens. The Society of Friends and other splendid organizations which are doing so much for the assistance of those poor people in that unhappy land are entitled to the most generous response from the people of the United States.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VAILE. I will.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Does he not know that when Mr. Hoover raised $30,000,000 for charitable purposes, it took some four or five months, and if we depended on private charity for the purpose of sending aid to Russia it would not do any good?

Mr. VAILE. That may be true, and if you cut off every objection you can probably find a great many instances where it would seem we could not extend relief at all unless it were done by appropriation of public funds. It does not seem to me that this justifies such an appropriation. There may be cases where it would, but I certainly do not think that this is one of those cases. It is raised by taxes and involuntary process.

Mr. SIEGEL. Does not the gentleman remember that in 1907, at the request of President Roosevelt, we appropriated $500,000 for the earthquake sufferers in Italy, and later on we appropriated additional money for that purpose?

Mr. VAILE. There may have been special reasons in those cases, but the fact that there have been precedents for devoting public funds raised by taxation to the relief of foreign peoples is not, to my mind, an argument for doing it again.

Mr. SIEGEL. Is not that the history of the country from the time of its formation to the present time?

Mr. VAILE. I do not think it is. I think it has been occasionally refused.

Mr. SIEGEL. I do not know of any time when it has been asked by the President that it has been refused by Congress. A few years ago I looked up the precedents. I thought the report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs might have them, but I see that they have not.

Mr. VAILE. There may be those cases, and while I would willingly contribute my share, this is not a case for a compulsory levy against the people of the United States.

Mr. SIEGEL. Has the gentleman or anybody else received in opposition to this resolution a single letter or telegram, or has he noted a single editorial opposition?

Mr. VAILE. My dear sir, let me say this, that in a matter in which I feel that I am a trustee, I would not change my vote if my entire district opposed me.

Mr. SIEGEL. I want to say that I was not questioning the gentleman's views.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] such time as he may require.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the Republican platform has recommended to Congress to enact legislation to stamp out the stain of the lynching evil upon our civilization. The President of the United States in his message recommended that Congress enact legislation to that effect. The Committee on the Judiciary of this House, by a majority vote, brought in a bill known as the Dyer bill, recommending its passage and claiming that it is constitutional. The Attorney General of the United States has given to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary an unofficial opinion, in which he held that all the bill was constitutional.

That involves a serious question, and one to which I have devoted a great deal of time in investigating the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; and in order to give the individual Members of this House, who took an oath to maintain and support the Constitution against all enemies, both foreign and domestic, a chance to determine the exercise of that duty in accord with the integrity of their oaths and the integrity of the Constitution, I have determined to make these remarks prior to the actual consideration of the bill, so that they, together with the compilation and extracts of the decisions of the Supreme Court on this question, may be put in the RECORD, that all who desire may have the opportunity to quickly inform themselves and determine whether or not they will maintain the integrity of their oaths, the integrity of the Constitution, the integrity of the relations that our Federal and State Governments under the Constitution bear to each other, and that both bear to the people, or whether they will depart from the path of duty, prostrate themselves upon the shrine of political expediency, and sacrifice the best interests of our country to a political god.

Mr. Chairman, the crimes of the rape fiend, followed by the lynching outrages, so shocking to the world and disgraceful to our civilization, stir us to the depths. They demand our most profound condemnation. No one questions their atrocious character. We are unanimous that they should be penalized in the most drastic way. No appropriate means should be overlooked or withheld to curb their insatiate spirit of rape and murder. Every conservative remedy should be applied to purge us from their black stain of dishonor and cruelty. If the American people are to enjoy the chivalrous and intrepid glory of the mightiest and best Government of history, these fiendish activities and harrowing ordeals must cease. Our seeming madness and savagery, incident to the wild cry of the victim of the rape devil, must be corrected for our own relief and for our own vindication. But, Mr. Chairman, we must proceed by conservative and orderly paths and in the constitutional way, for no calamity can befall us so destructive of our cherished ideals and so fraught with inhumanity and dreadful sacrifice as indifference to the truths embodied and enunciated by our great charter of American freedom.

The Negro race that should know the value of real education and should be conscious of its own deficiencies should also know that no other race has had thrust upon it such chances to redeem itself from the unfortunate fate of a savage and degraded origin. True it is that the overload of our incomparable civilization was suddenly imposed upon the abnormal and the inexperienced. Of course the burden was heavy, its light blinding, and its trials were bewildering. God's pity that the delusions of partisan power should have driven the poor untutored and helpless freedman into the shambles of a conscienceless and unscrupulous slaughterhouse of political pillage. His notions of the education he needed readily impressed the simple dreamer with the visionary prospect of political power, and he irresistibly gravitated to a goal of equality, social and political, which was and is the frenzied passion of his life. Thus was his unsophisticated dream inflamed by the trickery of the partisan into the absurd policy of equality. If ever his benighted vision can realize that dependable usefulness and reliable character make the only irresistible force that forges to the front over every obstacle, one step to a better day may justify the possibility of a more promising future.

When sound becomes sense and his vocabulary means more than the pronunciation of high-sounding words and phrases, when love of the spectacular and the affectations of dignity give way to a sense of responsibility and abiding concern for substantial reality, when his appreciation of the relative values of life can calculate for permanence and high standards, his course will attract and command the confidence and trust of substantial men—that element of mankind which must cooperate and without which he is doomed to remain in darkness and perpetual inferiority.

LYNCHING CONDITIONS EXCITE THE LYNCHING.

But, Mr. Chairman, while emphatic denunciations are due the lyncher and the lynching, we must remember that the hellish outrage that fires the spirit of retaliation is the most damnable known to the imagination, and that not one spot of earth can be located where the infuriated multitude will not override every barrier to avenge the pitiless horror, and that while to a degree the racial prejudice may account for the diabolical motive, it must be conceded that the race most addicted to the tragic infamy has long enjoyed its distinction as the most favored race protégé ever coddled and petted by the sentimental sacrifice of an indulgent people.

INDEPENDENT WILL AND ACTION ESSENTIAL TO BETTERMENT.

The hope of an individual, or of a race, must rest for promotion on its own independent spirit and on its own intrepid effort. No man, nor set of men, has ever achieved success except by the independent resolution and activity of self-control and self-centered enterprise and determination.

NATURE LIMITS AND CONFIRMS THE CONSTITUTION.

And no sagacious attempt will try to efface the lines of demarcation or to tear down the standards set by the hand of God to indicate and maintain His limitations of racial integrity.

The most cursory glance can see that natural law is beyond the repeal of any human power. No one has ever beheld a vulture and an eagle in close companionship or in the mutual exchanges of a common feeding ground. The hooting owl has never blended its sepulchral call with the mounting song of the nightingale. The leopard's spots still bask in the depths of the jungle, and the skin of the Ethiopian is unchanged within the ages of man. The lion and the lamb have not yet realized the millennial prospectus. Then, why should anyone indulge the hope, much less the attempt, to countermand or controvert the eternal decrees by an effort to obliterate the racial distinction fixed by creation, or contradict by any human law the fixed antagonism established by God Himself.

THE CONSTITUTION NOT IN CONFLICT WITH NATURE.

The Constitution of the United States interdicts nor violates any of the plain mandates of nature and common sense. We must understand that these limitations are definite and inexorable.

The decrees of infinite wisdom from on high were chiseled into man by the Hand Divine and give to human nature its unerring instincts of self-direction, self-preservation, and self-control. These principles of natural endowment, so determined by God Himself constitute the everlasting foundation for the best constructive powers of man. Under such an inspiration and by such handiwork, the joint creation of God and man, the Constitution of the United States of America fully justifies the well-known eulogy of Gladstone—who declared that—> the Constitution of the United States is the greatest piece of constructive work ever struck off by the hand of man in a given time.

Within this age of irrepressible conflict the remedy can only approximate relief; we can only mitigate the conditions by the graces of a better spirit, inculcated by conservative statesmanship and the reasonable exercise of responsible power.

That kind of conservative spirit is not in this Dyer bill nor in the entire record of peremptory measures thus far before us. All of them are dogmatic; and any one of them, if passed by Congress and enacted into law, is certain to intensify and aggravate the atrocious evils they attack. The stain of the lynch license can not be removed by what will give it a denser hue. The stench of political miasma can not be dissipated by the breath of the odors exhaled from the rottenness of party bias and sectional hate.

Mr. Chairman, let us not be deluded by the bluster of heroic words or the attitude of intemperate passion. They can never serve the master builders of the temple of human welfare. The infirmities of human nature have ever walked in the procession of human affairs; and whoever dreams of the day of deliverance from human frailty is doomed to disappointment and utter defeat.

But there is a "balm in Gilead" which, if it can be applied, will go as far as human agency can go to put our people and our country "in the ways of pleasantness and the paths of peace." If the criminal element of our country will cease committing the diabolical crimes for which they are lynched, the lynching will cease forever. * * *

But the world knows no saner, safer, nor more efficient treatment for our deep-rooted political woes than has been given by the Constitution and as interpreted by the Supreme Court. Its great judicial decisions are ample in number and character; and they determine beyond controversy the limitations of Federal power in dealing with what specifically belongs to the prerogatives of the State, as provided in the Constitution. The Constitution is supreme and universal in the scope of its pervading power. It is binding in its specified and inexorable reservations to the States and it is equally binding as to the delegated powers of the Federal Government. It is binding in what is granted and what is not granted. It is binding to destroy, to nullify, all that might be done or assumed by the General Government outside of its powers, as well as to invalidate any State action within this exclusive domain.

If we study our Government, we find that the entire system, Federal and State, was the voluntary act of the free and independent States. The Federal Government was established by the States, which cooperated for that purpose, each for itself and mutually for each other, that they might commit to a general agency, in trust for them, what could better be done for them than could be done by them, acting in a popular mass, or individually and separately. That was what the States intended to do and what they did. It was from the first a combination entered into for the express purposes of the revolutionary war. By their free and voluntary action they combined and won their independence. When that was done they, by their uncompromised and untrammeled original right, dissolved the confederated war union.

The Articles of Confederation by experience were found to be inadequate for the greater and more comprehensive cooperation required. A more important agency was needed in their domestic economics and in the natural relations to be maintained with each other and with foreign peoples. And, therefore, they exercised the right, never surrendered, and voluntarily disintegrated from their tentative, make-shift association. This was done to effect a more adequate economic arrangement for their mutual and reciprocal benefit. There were interests common to all that could better be prosecuted under the great general agency of a more perfect union. And so it was that the more perfect union was formed and under its Constitution adopted by each State separately. The United States entered its career for mutual and reciprocal advantange. But independence and self-control, never surrendered by word or act of the States, was a supreme and ideal principle, fostered and cherished; an immortal soul within the entity of each one of the cooperating State sovereignties. A premeditated, absolute sovereignty, begotten and conceived in the ideal spirit and experience of "give me liberty or give me death."

We find in the great decisions of the Supreme Court that the fundamentals of constitutional safeguard to the States are as explicitly stated as language can assert and as indisputable in interpretation as the greatest masters of law and logic can formulate.

These decisions of the great court constitute our governmental safeguard, and we must bow implicitly to them or be dashed to pieces on the rocks and reefs of an irresponsible socialism and the destructive ravages of a lawless anarchy.

Beginning with the Slaughterhouse case, in which Judge Washington most minutely elaborated that great judgment, we were treated to a deliverance which was then like a star of the first magnitude in the clouded skies of constitutional liberty.

Mr. Chairman, the creation of the Government of the United States was the most logical evolution in the history of constructive statesmanship. The thirteen original Colonies, existing by charter right from the King of England, were separate and independent Provinces, though subject to the Crown. Under the sting of intolerable oppression they rebelled against the mother country and combined to throw off its yoke, signing to that effect the great Declaration of Independence on July 4, 1776. Under definite Articles of Confederation they united in their tentative government to maintain their great declaration.

The struggle that ensued called for the leadership of Gen. George Washington, and after seven years of memorable conflict victory perched upon the banners of the heroic confederation, named even at that incipient stage "the United States of America." The grant by England of the independence they had won was the specific recognition that each one of the revolting Colonies was recognized an independent and sovereign nation.

Turning from war to peaceful avocations, the inefficient organization of the Confederated Union under the impetus and the necessity of a better and stronger government agreed and arranged among themselves for the consummation of "a more perfect union." For that purpose they met as a Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia in the month of May, 1787. And with the immortal Washington presiding, "the first in peace," as he had been "the first in war," the most significant body of statesmen that ever deliberated in the interest of human welfare proceeded to their task of constructing our organic law.

The remarkable personnel of that body justifies the exclamation, "There were giants in those days." No greater characters known in the administration of affairs have ever given such strength and ability to so righteous and beneficent a cause as were consecrated to the service of formulating the articles and principles of the peerless document which was to shape the destiny of this mighty Republic. It would be invidious to call the roll; but the strength of early manhood and the wisdom of advanced age were blended in the dependable prosecution of the unequaled responsibility.

The youngest of the delegates, John Francis Mercer, of Virginia, was 28. Alexander Hamilton, at 30, has been accredited with the most powerful direct argument of the convention. James Madison, at 36, was an engine of commanding energy, with singular faculties of detail. Gen. Washington was 55, and Franklin was 81. It is to be observed that the men who framed the Constitution were in the prime of manhood and the maturity of age.

Their conclusions were convincing then; and they have not molded with time. Long since consigned to honored graves, their fame is ever fresh; and if they were alive to-day we could not cite their superiors among the statesmen of the times. It will be to our credit to respect and venerate the legacy of constitutional law bequeathed to us by "the Fathers"; and we should be ready to resist by every appropriate means in our power any encroachment that invalidates these fundamental safeguards of civil and religious liberty, written for us by their consummate foresight and almost divine wisdom.

INDIVIDUAL LIBERTY AND RESPONSIBILITY OF DIVINE ORIGIN.

Mr. Chairman, in the deliberations of this constitution-making body of patriotic councilors it is safe to assume that the ideals of personal liberty, individual responsibility, and self-restraint were prime considerations. Hailing from Mount Sinai it was embodied in the decalogue. It was written on the tables of stone, and it was taught by the mosaic law.

The reiterated "thou" and "thee" of the God-given Ten Commandments were obviously not intended to be collective or in the plural number.

MORAL AND SOCIAL LAW.

"The moral law," the first four commandments are so designated, was meant to be, as addressed, to the individual. The first one, an explicit command, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," is evidently intended for the person. The second one, "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image," and so forth, was also intended for one at a time. And the personal unit is legislated for by the last six of the commandments, which make by common acceptation "the social law." The first of the six, "Honor thy father and thy mother," and so forth, is clearly a personal admonition for the son or the daughter. It can have no exclusive personal import, nor does any of the ten refer collectively to the community.

PERSONAL ACCOUNTABILITY NOT THE SOLE IDEA.

It was not a thought, Mr. Chairman, of the convention to specialize for the person only, and thereby eliminate the general interest and authority; not a member who did not realize that individuals make society. And the individual citizen of to-day appreciates his relationship to his community and knows of his responsibility to his fellow man. He knows he can not escape a personal nor avoid a mutual and common relationship and accountability.

HARD TO RECONCILE THE INDIVIDUAL AND THE SOCIAL RIGHT.

It is and has been the difficult thing with statesmen to so adjust these individual and social rights and privileges that their inevitable differences will not become dangerous and destructive to each other.

Both personal and social interests exist and are contemplated in constitutions and laws, and each of them is a factor in the authority and operation of all law.

Analogous to heat and cold in nature, and to good and bad in ethics, as in all subjects of the continuity kind, it is a problem to define and locate the points of contrast and change. In human affairs human infirmity prevails, and the violence of conflict is inevitable, though conservative restraint has often been exercised to avoid the extremes of factional madness.

These contradictory elements in human kind were in mind by our Constitution makers to be arranged for the constructive instrument which was to guide a great and growing people through unprecedented trials, and were at times to strain every bolt and timber of our storm-driven ship of state.

In the preservation of the liberties which the Constitution was to guarantee, the most important was the fundamental of personal accountability. It would clearly be a departure from the governmental doctrine and practice of the past not to stress the individual as the sovereign. On the other hand, it was plain that the ideal of personal liberty was a factor of essential and primal importance, for personal responsibility is the main element in popular government. The day had come and the edict had been pronounced and the challenge had been proclaimed to the autocratic world, Thus far and no farther. Henceforth "we, the people," will assume our own direction and take charge of our own affairs.

But the task was a trying one, for the intricate legal questions to be settled, and the various ambitions to be considered, and the conflicting opinions and controversies to be satisfied, and many other incidental perplexities to be met, engaged the surpassing ability of the convention, and held it in the grip of patriotic passion. In the forefront was the problematic task of reconciling in government the apparently unavoidable conflict between the two opposing fundamentals of individual and social privilege and right. It was Anglo-Saxon in its origin and untried by any great people. No such effort had engaged the Republics of the Old World. They had exploited the State regardless of the personal subject. They considered no individual as clothed with any right independent of the State to oppose the State by military power.

AN ANGLO-SAXON IDEAL.

The Anglo-Saxon began at an early day to think out the ideas so forcefully expressed in our Declaration of Independence. More thoroughly than ever before the inalienable rights of the individual were unfolded and asserted in that consummate proclamation, which looks to the personal equation as the first and principal concern of government. The right to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness as an inherent right and not by governmental patronage was the dominant demand for the individual.

MAGNA CHARTA.

The barons of England demanded a limitation of the prerogatives and powers of the Crown, but not a grant of right for the person. They asserted inherent right and demanded their individual freedom, and that their personal rights should be respected. The charter was made to pledge:

No freeman shall be taken or imprisoned or be disseized of his freehold, or his liberties, or his free customs, or be outlawed or exiled, or otherwise destroyed except by the lawful judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.

The great charter was confirmed over and over by other broad concessions: By the Petition of Rights, by the habeas corpus act, by the Bill of Rights, by the Massachusetts body of Liberties, by the Virginia Bill of Rights, and finally by the immortal Declaration of 1776.

In all the developments of that liberty loving day the same dominant demand for the inalienable and inherent right of personal manhood was asserted under government, but, if necessary, in spite of government, and it was insisted upon in the name of life and liberty and property.

THE CONVENTION SETTING.

Mr. Chairman, the staging of the Constitutional Convention was extraordinary and impressive. Its personnel was exceptionally distinguished. The presiding officer, commanding in appearance and unexcelled in fame, was without a rival. He had been tested by all of the experiences of leadership, and his prestige invested him with the personality of a born ruler.

The 55 members, representing 12 States, were men of eminent ability and character.

CONSTITUENT CHARACTER.

Without exception the body was composed of clear-headed and substantial men; and many of them were noted for ability and high courage. Each State except Rhode Island was represented, making 12 States whose delegates constituted the great convention. Many immortal names graced the assembly, and no such array of character and strength had met together on an occasion so momentous to the devoted patriots of the New World. Many of them had passed through the baptismal fires of revolutionary war and were primed to secure what they had risked everything to attain. But there were differences. Some hoped to signalize themselves and their respective States. Others who were inspired by the pioneer spirit were committed to the prospect of the more perfect union, which was the animating impulse of the assembly. But the purest and truest patriotism was the ruling passion, and the doubts and misgivings and adversities of centuries of failure gave the nerve and caution essential to the success which was the crown of rejoicing sure to adorn the brow of consecration and unfading immortality. But, dedicated and pledged as they were to the holiest aim that ever vocalized human thought and energy, the convention was not to sail before auspicious breezes and over unmuffled waters.

A NEW CONSTITUTION.

The convention at once proceeded to form a new Constitution instead of attempting to reconstruct the old one. This brought to the front immediately its most scholarly and capable leaders, and the original idea and mature thought of the profoundest statesmen of the times were intently and intensely centered in the construction of what was to prove to be the masterful instrument of organic law of all recorded time.

Sweeping aside all personal interests and irrelevant and impertinent and immaterial matters, the most important subjects soon engrossed the earnest and determined attention.

The small States' contention was taken up and finally resulted in the establishment of popular representation based on population in a House of Representatives. The statehood idea, contemplating the abstract principle of the State per se, was to be set forth by the Senate. Each of them were to have separate but reciprocal duties, and each to be recognized by its separate legislative organism, and technically known as the House of Representatives and the Senate. Together they constituted, with full and exclusive legislative power, the Congress of the United States of America.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION.

Mr. Chairman, with the Government machinery thoroughly understood, these astute students and makers of the Constitution faced the question of the principles of government. They had builded well their threefold structure of executive, legislative, and judicial powers.

The executive, the President, administrative head and advisor and censor, and the legislative branches, the House and Senate, were exhaustively considered and duly ordered. They were to be creatures of the people, representative of their authority and amenable and directly responsible to their sovereign will. But the necessity and demand for an arbiter, invested with power to determine the constitutional integrity of any measure or act affecting the interests of the people, was provided by the plan and equipment of the Supreme Court. This great tribunal was to be made up of its judges and subsidiaries, was to be constructed by the mutual and cooperative work of the appointive executive power and confirmed by the Senate of the legislative branch, and it was to be charged with the exalted duties of guide and guardian for the Constitution. As thus organized the poise of the governmental machine has held its equilibrium for more than a century.

So far the three branches of our democratic Government have cooperated with admirable success, and popular government has so completely vindicated America from the taunt of predicted failure that the autocracies everywhere have deserted the palace, and the crown has become but the symbol of monarchy throughout the earth.

GOVERNMENT SPIRIT AND DOCTRINE.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the splendid edifice must rest upon its foundation, ample and strong. The temple must stand or fall by the doctrines taught within its walls. Every residence has an occupant and every occupant a soul.

No government exists without its creed, and the principles by which it exists make its political plan of salvation. So that when the United States was to function, the pages of history, taught by the successes and failures of every governmental experiment of the past, were an open book.

These experiences were the guides, pro and con, for the most stupendous undertaking of history. The rise and fall of human effort in government, detailed and summed up, was law and gospel to the scholarly delegates. They knew that all the fantastic theories of the purely popular had gone to the wall, and that socialism, under many an adventurous title and reckless impulse, had proved the impracticable character of every purely popular government for a miscellaneous people.

They knew that socialism was worn out long ages ago and that wherever practically operated in a considerable way it had resulted in disorder and halted civilization and progress.

REPRESENTATIVE DEMOCRACY.

The representative principle, fostered by the English people in the "Mother of Parliaments" and now known everywhere, was the standard taught and incorporated in our Constitution. It was practically new and not appreciated as an element of substantial strength, a quality unknown in the history of preceding peoples, who had failed in all attempts to govern by the direct will of the citizens in mass.

Mr. Chairman, by organizing the executive, the legislative, and the judicial entirely apart but mutual and cooperative, and by establishing a representative system and making a Supreme Court, invested with extraordinary powers, the 55 makers of the Constitution made democracy powerful and safe and barred it from becoming autocratic and freed it from the impulses of destruction. To avoid the danger of sudden and momentary impulses they arranged for any change proposed, of a radical kind, to be subject to deliberate and mature reflection by a premeditated "laws delay." With time, passion cools and conservative thought will control the reckless and fiery spirit of men.

And time has proved these apostles of construction to have been endowed with rare powers of foresight and practical sense. For the Constitution has more than satisfied its friends and it has utterly dumbfounded its carping critics. Under it our mighty Republic has grown and prospered until it is the leading Nation of the world.

The Constitution with its provisions insisting on individual rights and local self-government, with manifestly necessary and appropriate limitations, led irresistibly to the question of how to apply the specifics of the great system to secure and perpetuate the benefits of the inspired prescription.

Logically and with wonderful prevision, the master minds had divined the essentials and had skillfully formulated the eternal doctrines and decrees for American liberty. Now, the ways and means of putting into successful practice the theories and principles enunciated was the all-absorbing problem confronting them. How the personal-liberty principle, how the local-interest principle, how the positive essentials and fundamental doctrines could be imbued into the spiritual thought of the people and made habitual in their daily lives was the Herculean proposition. And to the consummation of that statesman's holy dream, all the infinite intellectual capacity of that splendid council chamber was addressed and concentrated.

We of this exceptional day, peculiar in its strides of advancement, peculiar in its miraculous accomplishments in science and art, strange in its backward and downward impulses—we, I say, Mr. Chairman, must stand with uncompromising front and determination to stay the unhappy retrogression which so disturbs the prospect of our incomparable country.

After the insatiate principles of individual rights and representative democracy had been considered and satisfied, the Federal expedient—the organic association of the States—became the momentous topic of the convention. This federation ideal had also, with that of representative democracy, impressed the Anglo-Saxon thought, and had been experimentally and imperfectly advanced to negligible importance by the English people.

But the proposition as perfected in our Constitution was unknown and unique until incorporated in the immortal document of 1787 and 1789. All of the previous confederations were only "leagues of States," of temporary design and short lived. Ours was to be, in hope and design, the permanent instrument to create an unprecedented Republic, pregnant with indissoluble principles, and to expand into a nation of perpetual life, and vitalized with the everlasting energy of conservative power and with the enjoyment of every righteous liberty consistent with the cardinal principles of freedom and equality.

DUAL FORM OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Chairman, it would entertain and instruct to trace step by step the construction of our Constitution and to review the plans and theories considered. But it is decidedly more important to understand the whys of its construction and to familiarize ourselves with the true import of its provisions.

The dual form of our Government was adopted and equipped with its checks and balances that it might surely provide and certainly secure equality in the administration of the rights demanded and guaranteed and in harmony with the ideals of unfettered life. It was planned in the interest of genuine liberty, that fundamental justice might be enthroned and administered in harmony with the self-evident truths and principles of their passionate hope and ideal doctrines.

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT ESTABLISHED.

Therefore the 13 original States, proud of their independence and conscious of their untrammeled sovereign rights and prerogatives, considered and debated and concluded how they could best secure for their own accommodation and service a safe and competent general agency. The chief concern was how to safely intrust the needed current business of the contemplated family of States and how to invest their fiduciary commission with adequate powers and limitations.

They knew the dangers of trust violation, and they knew the temptation and trend of ambitious power.

To this end and for this peculiar purpose the Federal Government was established, and its specific powers and duties were announced, enumerated, and defined. Within this limit of specific and circumscribed action the Federal duties and rights were delegated by the sovereign power of the States, and defined and limited to interests of Federal and national scope and concern. And its jurisdiction, so circumscribed and defined, is supreme within that limit, but is barred and prohibited outside of its constitutional barricade from every conflicting or interfering participation or assumption in the affairs of a sovereign State.

Within its delegated powers it is sovereign; it is sovereign and supreme; beyond its delegated limits the Federal power can exercise no constitutional function whatever, and if it assumes that right it transcends its limitations and opposes the only original pristine sovereignty known to the authority of the Constitution. Its rights and duties, assigned and imposed by the State authority, were specific and enumerated; all of them were of that character of general concern, not appropriately subject to the local State control and direction, and far more advantageously committed to an agency especially organized for the purposes of more efficient general service.

The rights delegated and the duties conferred and specified for their great constitutional trustee, and to be exclusively in its care a delegated but limited sovereignty were these:

POWERS OF THE UNITED STATES ARE DELEGATED.

[Quoting from the J. Z. George report.]

Looking to the whole scheme of Federal and State Governments, we find its primal fundamental principle, the key to its exposition, is that the powers possessed by the United States are delegated; that is given or granted to them by some political organism or organisms and are in no sense inherent or original. Before any of these powers were thus granted there were no powers in the United States—in fact, no United States existed. The United States as they now exist as a Government were created by the Constitution. That instrument, in the act of making, the States united under it, dissolved their union under the Articles of Confederation.

The ten amendments, adopted almost contemporaneously with the Constitution and designed to put into constitutional form a great truth then recognized by all, so as to prevent mistake or misconception in all after times, expressly declares that the powers possessed by the United States are "delegated"; and all the powers "not prohibited" to the States are "reserved," not granted, not given, but "reserved" to the States, "respectively"; not to the States in a mass, or aggregated or united, but to the States, "respectively," or to the people. The powers are not even said to be "vested" in the United States when reference is made to their origin. They are only "delegated" and then they are said to be "vested" in the Government, and in its various departments as a consequence of this delegation. The powers thus "delegated" are not the great mass of the powers of Government, with exceptions in favor of the States, but they are enumerated, specified, written in the Constitution itself, and defined and limited by it.

THE GENERAL SCHEME OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The general scheme of the Constitution was to make us one people with one country, for all the great purposes for which it was established. (See Chief Justice Taney in Passenger Cases Y. How. R. 283.)

The great purposes are expressed in the Constitution itself, in the powers delegated by it to the United States. These powers are plenary and exclusive as to all that concerns the people and States in their relations with foreign powers, both in peace and in war, including the making of treaties, the receiving and sending of ambassadors, ministers, and consuls; making war and concluding peace; intercourse and commerce with them; the protection of our people in foreign countries, and outside of the jurisdiction of any State and on the high seas.

Secondly, the Federal powers extend to the regulation of relation between the States themselves and the citizens of each with the citizens of the other, and between each of the States and the United States, covering commerce among the States, compacts between two or more of them, the duty of surrendering fugitives from justice and labor, the force and effect in other States of public record and judicial proceedings of each State; "the securing to the citizens of each State the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several States," when in the jurisdiction of any State of which they are not citizens, leaving, however, to each State to determine and define the rights and privileges of its own citizens, and securing only these same privileges so defined by a State to citizens of other States when they are within its jurisdiction.

Thirdly, the power and duty to guarantee to each State a republican form of government and to protect it from invasion, or, on application of the State, from domestic or foreign violence. These were the great purposes for which the Constitution was formed and adequate powers to attain them were granted.

All other powers delegated to the United States are either merely auxiliary to these great ends and for the support and maintenance of the common government, or they are such as can conveniently and properly be exercised only by a government common to all the States. The auxiliary powers relate to the establishment of a uniform system of bankruptcy and naturalization laws; the power to coin money, to regulate its value and the value of foreign coins in circulation here; to fix the standard of weights and measures; to grant patents and copyrights, to establish post offices and post roads; the power of taxation; to punish counterfeiting of the current coin and securities of the United States; to punish piracies and felonies on the high seas and offenses against the law of nations; to raise and support armies, and support and maintain a navy, and certain powers over the militia.

These powers in general terms include all that were delegated to the United States. If we stop and consider them, we will see how few they are great indeed in importance, unlimited in degree, but very limited in number. If we abstract from these powers all that relate to our intercourse with foreign nations—all that concern the relations of the States with each other, in their character as States and their relation to the Union; all that relate only to the giving force, efficacy, and support to the United States in their exercise of their other powers—we will see how infinitely small in number are all the remaining powers, which concern only the rights, privileges, and conveniences of private persons—private citizens when in the jurisdiction of a State.

These powers are:

(1) The securing to the citizens of the several States the privileges and immunities granted by any State in whose jurisdiction they may be to its own citizens.
(2) Jurisdiction over bankruptcy.
(3) Jurisdiction over naturalization.
(4) Jurisdiction over the currency.
(5) The power to establish post offices and post roads.

We look in vain in any of these powers for the power to enact this bill. But along with these powers come provisions which show the soul and spirit of the Constitution, and without which the Constitution becomes either a lifeless corpse or, having energy and vitality, is an instrument only of oppression and wrong. These provisions recognized the absolute equality of the State and secure fairness and impartiality in the exercise of the powers granted by the Constitution. Thus direct taxes are required to be apportioned among the States according to their population, and all duties, imposts, and exercises are required to be uniform throughout the United States; no preference is allowed in any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over the ports of another; the levying of a tax on any article exported from any State is also prohibited, whereby the dangerous power of taxing articles mainly produced in one State or section and not in others is denied to the Government.

And then there is a great provision in Article V, which secures absolutely and forever the equal suffrage in the Senate of each State against even an amendment to the Constitution. Under this guaranty of equality Delaware, Rhode Island, and Nevada each have the same voice in the Senate as the great State of New York.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, it could not have been an acceptable proposition with the States so recently freed from the yoke of tyranny and oppression to subject or risk their dearly bought rights and liberties to any kind of despotic control; and they well knew that any centralized power, whether in a monarch or in the people, was a condition to be feared. They had no idea of delegating all or indiscriminately the independence and freedom which was theirs by the verdict of war, and by the determination of native strength and power, and by the impulses and aspirations of a self-governing ability. Therefore the Constitution provided that:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

These especially reserved powers which relate to such consideration of personal and local interest as are essential to individual and community welfare and naturally and materially and exclusively in the State's care and any domestic or economic trouble is properly under the local authority of the State, and all violence and turbulence are remedial by the police regulations and powers of the State.

POWERS PROHIBITED TO THE STATE.

The scheme of the Constitution embraces not only a division of powers between the several States and the United States by delegation of certain ones specified to the latter, and a reservation of the others to the States, but it includes also the prohibition of certain powers to both. These powers, so far as they relate to persons, were deemed despotic in their nature, unjust in their operation, and contrary to the genius of free government; and hence, whilst prohibiting their exercise by the Federal Government, the States also surrendered them as a pledge of their fidelity to the great principles of republican liberty.

Three of these powers related to the lives and liberties of the persons, namely, bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, and the suspension of the great writ of habeas corpus; one of property, viz, laws impairing the obligation of contracts; and the others related only to the quality of persons in a free government, namely, the bestowing titles of nobility. These powers were refused to both. The power over contracts, however, was allowed to the Federal Government indirectly in its power over bankruptcy.

There were some other prohibitions to the State, but they were manifestly introduced for the purpose of preventing a conflict between State powers and Federal powers, which might, but for the prohibition, have been concurrent. In all these there is not a pretense for the claim of the Federal Government to intervene between a State and its citizens for the protection and security of the great fundamental rights of persons and property and the pursuit and acquisition of happiness, all these being left to the care and protection of the States, except only in the four cases of habeas corpus, bill of attainder, ex post facto laws, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Of all the civil rights of men and all the rights of person and property, only these above named, and no more, are entitled to Federal protection in favor of a citizen against his State, and this protection extends only to the prevention of State action in violation of them, as will be shown more fully hereafter. And not one of these rights is secured against State action, even in favor of citizens of another State, except to this extent, that citizens of other States should have from each State the like protection that it affords to its own citizens.

Mr. Chairman, this discussion and recital of the inherent and reserved powers of the States ought to satisfy the shallow thinker as well as the profoundest observer. In the view of the narrow and the morbid, when the disposition to stultify all political standards is rampant, it is exceedingly profitable to pause and maturely reflect. We should not permit ourselves to degrade and befog the powers, duties, dignities, and importance of the States. We should not expect the United States Government to adjust all wrongs, to correct all evils, to create prosperity and arrest adversity, to hand out wealth and relieve poverty, and for such purposes to place its powers over interstate commerce and over all taxation, that one interest may prosper at the expense of another, to destroy one interest for the advancement of another, to take charge of industrial enterprises and the health affairs of the State. To command whatever relates to good order and morality in the people, to extend subsidies and bounties from the common treasury and property for private interest.

Because of such common recklessness in thought and temper, it may be well to name in detail some of the great powers which are constitutionally and exclusively reserved to the States. The following may serve to impress the significance and importance of the ideas and facts hereinbefore mentioned and referred to:

SOME OF THE GREAT POWERS RESERVED TO THE STATES.

In this grand jurisdiction thus reserved to or kept by the States is the entire power over all contracts; who may make contracts, and who are incapable of making them from want of mature age or of mental capacity or of freedom of will; the form in which they must be made; the evidence to establish or defeat them, their nature and obligations; the consequences of default in complying with them, and the sole remedies to enforce them amongst citizens of the same State. The sole power over marriage; who can contract it; the forms to be observed in celebrating it; the relative rights, powers, and duties of a husband and wife toward each other and in the community; the causes and manner of its dissolution, and all the relations and mutual duties and powers, and rights of parent and child; and superadded is the institution of the family (the unit and basis of our civilization) with the right to acquire and hold against adverse fortune the homestead for shelter and conservation. The titles and tenures to all property of every kind; the modes and forms of its acquisition and transfer; how the right to it may be lost by neglect or acquiescence in wrong; what are injuries to it and the nature and extent of redress for such injury; by what rule it shall be enjoyed in life, and on the death of the owner how it shall descend and be distributed, and on what failure of blood it shall escheat to the States; the right to dispose of it by will, and by whom and in what forms wills must be made; whether entails or primogeniture shall be allowed, and to what extent property may be held in mortmain by corporations, and by what rights, if any, corporations created in other States or in foreign nations shall enjoy in its jurisdiction; the civil status of its people as to legitimacy or the contrary as effected by their birth, their education in youth, their civil rights, their qualification to vote and hold office, and their conduct in life, and their protection and security in life, liberty, property, and reputation; crimes against property, larceny, robbery, burglary, arson, malicious injuries and trespass, cheats, embezzlement, forgeries, and the like; crimes against the person, assaults, batteries, mayhems, murder, seduction, false imprisonment, and all others; offenses against reputation and character, slander and libel; offenses against good order and good morals and the health of the community; the great right of the free exercise of religious worship and freedom of religious belief and freedom of speech and of the press; all of these and more of like character are solely within the jurisdiction and power of the States and depend on their laws and government for preservation and protection. In short, the State authority meets the child as at its birth, attends him through infancy, manhood, and old age, and at his death, and is sufficient, if wisely exerted, to secure to him all the blessings which make life desirable in this world and the opportunity of gaining for himself in his free exercise of his religious belief a blissful hereafter.

The Supreme Court of the United States not only confirms the above divisions of power between Federal and State Governments but holds that the Federal Government is supreme when acting within any of the powers specifically and expressly delegated to it under the Constitution, and that the States are equally supreme when exercising any of their reserved powers, as above defined. It needs but a few quotations from the well-considered opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States to settle beyond controversy the above statements.

THE SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASE (16 WALL., R. 76).

The court said in the above case:

It would be the vainest show of learning to prove by citation of authority that up to the adoption of the recent amendments (thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth) no claim was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection beyond the very express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed on the States, such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts. But with the exception of these and a few other restrictions, the entire domain of privileges of citizens of the States, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative powers of the State and without that of the Federal Government.

Again, in the case of the United States v. Cruickshank (92 U. S. Rep., 554), Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, stated:

The rights of life and personal liberty are natural rights of man. To secure these rights, says the Declaration of Independence, "Governments were established among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." The very highest duty of the States when they entered into the Union under the Constitution was to protect all persons in their jurisdiction in the enjoyment of these "inalienable rights with which they are endowed by their Creator." Sovereignty for this purpose rests alone with the States.

And the same court in the same case, on page 550, uses the following language:

The Government (of the United States), thus established and defined, is to some extent a government of the States in their political capacity. It is also for certain purposes a government of the people. Its powers are limited in number, but not in degree. Within the scope of its powers as enumerated and defined it is supreme and above the States; but beyond it has no existence.

If we hope to preserve the priceless governmental legacy transmitted to us by our fathers, we must see to it that the Federal Government and the respective State governments confine their activities strictly within the rights and powers belonging to each respectively. The Federal Government must not encroach upon the rights, powers, and prerogatives of the State government, neither must the State government exercise or attempt to exercise any of the rights and powers expressly delegated to the Federal Government, as contained in the Constitution of the United States.

Some people see what they conceive to be a great evil in society, which outrages their moral nature and contravenes their conception of right and wrong, and they immediately conclude that the Federal Government must remedy this evil. They do not stop to examine the grand scheme of our dual form of government and what powers belong to the Federal Government and what powers belong to the State government. This was illustrated during the years prior to the War between the States, when a great number of honest, though misguided, fanatics concluded that Negro slavery was the quintessence of all villainies, and finding the Constitution of the United States recognized African slavery as a legal institution, they proceeded to denounce our Constitution as a "covenant with death and a league with hell." Some claimed there was a "higher law" than the Constitution.

It is unnecessary to detail what followed during the four years of discord, of conflict, of war, havoc, and destruction that occurred during the battle tide of the sixties, as a result of not obeying in letter and spirit, in word and act the Constitution of our common country. African slavery would have disappeared before the evolutionary progress of modern thought and civilization without war or bloodshed. We of the South know no higher law than our Constitution. We are for it in letter and spirit, and recognize it as binding upon us in its every word and sentence, but we do insist that all others must be likewise bound by it. The Federal Government owes no duty to correct any evil, to create or protect any right beyond the power expressly conferred upon it. Chief Justice Waite in the Cruickshank case declared that "the duty of a Government to afford protection is limited always by the power it possesses for that purpose." No intelligent man will contend that up to the War between the States that Congress possessed any constitutional right to enact this bill. So that if said right exists it must be by reason of the provision of the reconstruction amendments to the Constitution of the United States. There are three of them. The thirteenth, which abolishes involuntary servitude. It and the eighteenth amendment are directed against individuals throughout the Union, by reason whereof Congress is vested with the constitutional power to pass direct and primary legislation to punish individual citizens in any State; but the power can not possibly be conferred under these amendments which merely abolish slavery and prohibit the liquor traffic. The fifteenth amendment provides that—

The right of the citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Evidently the authority is not conferred under this amendment.

The fourteenth amendment provides:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

The Attorney General of the United States and the majority members of the Judiciary Committee contend that they find constitutional authority under this fourteenth amendment to enact this bill. Let us analyze the bill, determine the full import of all its provisions, and apply the provisions of the fourteenth amendment and the decisions of the Supreme Court to it, and it will demonstrate beyond all reasonable doubt that it is unconstitutional, and if enacted into law the Supreme Court will so declare. The bill provides, first, that a mob or riotous assembly is composed of five or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of unlawfully depriving a person of his life as a punishment for crime.

Second. That if any State or governmental subdivision fails, neglects, or refuses to provide and maintain protection to the life of any person within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage such State shall, by reason thereof, be deemed to have denied to such person "the equal protection of the laws" of the State.

Third. That any State or municipal officer charged with the duty and authority of such officer to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by the mob, or who has such person in his charge as a prisoner, who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable effort to prevent such person from being put to death, shall be guilty of a felony.

Fourth. Any State or municipal officer, charged with the duty of apprehending or prosecuting any person participating in such mob, who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable effort to apprehend and prosecute to final judgment under the laws of such State, shall be guilty of a felony, and so forth.

Fifth. Any person who participates in a mob, who takes from the possession of any State or municipal officer any prisoner held by such officer and puts such prisoner to death shall be sent to the penitentiary for life or not less than five years.

Sixth. Any person who participates in a mob, who obstructs, or in any way prevents, a State or municipal officer in discharging his duty to apprehend, prosecute, protect, or punish any person suspected of or charged with any public offense, and puts such person to death shall be guilty of a felony and punished as above stated.

Seventh. That any person who participates in any mob by which a person is put to death shall be guilty of a felony and punished as above stated.

Eighth. That any county in which a person is put to death by a mob or any county into which or through which the victim is carried before he is put to death shall forfeit $10,000 to the family, or if he has no family, to the Government.

Ninth. That the Federal judge in whose court such forfeiture is recovered shall not only have all the ordinary means provided by law to collect such forfeiture but that he shall have the power to issue a mandatory order commanding the tax-levying officer of such district or county to levy a tax on the property of all the taxpayers of the entire county for the payment of such forfeiture, and if such State officer refuses said Federal judge shall have the power to commit such officer to jail as for contempt of court.

The first provision of the bill is merely the definition of a mob or riotous assembly. The second provision is a legislative finding or declaration, which if uttered by an individual would be denounced as a willful fabrication. Section 3, providing for the punishment of State and municipal officers, charged with duty and authority as such officers, to protect the life of any prisoner they may have in their custody, when in their power so to do, who fail or refuse to discharge such duty, is unconstitutional, first, because the right of such prisoner to be protected from mob violence is not a right secured to such prisoner under the Constitution and laws of the United States. Every citizen of a sovereign State must depend and rely exclusively upon the State government to protect all such rights. Second, because taking into consideration every provision in the bill you can not deduce therefrom the constitutional and legal definition of the denial by the State or its agents of the "equal protection of the law." It ignores the element of discrimination, of unequal treatment, essential to constitute the offense.

But this portion of the bill is unnecessary, and if enacted would only add confusion to the well-defined and settled law now upon the Federal Statutes, which in every respect covers the offense attempted to be defined and punished by this portion of this act. Under this law, if a State or municipal officer willfully permitted a prisoner to be taken from his possession and mobbed, such official could be indicted, prosecuted, and convicted under the following act—section 5508, United States Statutes:

If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or because of his having so exercised the same; or if two or more persons go in disguise on the highway, or on the premises of another, with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege so secured, they shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than 10 years, and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the United States.

Section 5509 provided in substance that if death should result or any other felony be committed in the act of violating any provisions of the foregoing section that the same punishment should be inflicted upon the offender as provided under the State law for that offense. This statute has repeatedly been held to be constitutional, and goes as far in punishing the citizens of a sovereign State as Congress has the constitutional authority to enact. Under it in the case of Logan v. United States (144 U. S. Court) it was held that a mob who took a prisoner from the custody of a United States deputy marshal and killed him was properly indicted and prosecuted. Its constitutionality was sustained upon the ground that the Constitution and laws of the United States secured to the prisoner the right of protection while legally in his custody as a deputy marshal of the United States. Justice Gray, in delivering the opinion of the court, stated:

The prisoners were in exclusive custody and control of the United States, under the protection of the United States, and in the peace of the United States there was a coextensive duty on the part of the United States to protect against lawless violence persons so within their custody, control, protection, and peace, and a corresponding right of those persons secured by the Constitution and laws of the United States to be protected by the United States. If the officers of the United States charged with the performance of the duty in behalf of the United States of affording that protection and securing that right neglected or violated their duty, the prisoners were not the less under the shield and panoply of the United States.

In Ex parte Virginia and Neill v. Delaware (100 U. S.) the Supreme Court held an act of Congress constitutional punishing a State officer for denying a citizen of that State the equal protection of the law in discriminating against such citizens on account of his race in selecting jurors for the State court. In rendering the opinion the court says:

Whoever by virtue of public position under a State government deprives another of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibitions, and as he acts in the name of and for the State and is clothed with the State power, his act is that of the State.

On the other hand, Congress passed an act—section 5519, United States Statutes—as follows:

If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire and go in disguise upon the highways or on the premises of another for the purpose of depriving, either directly or indirectly, any person or class of persons of the equal protection of the law, of equal privileges and immunities under the laws, or for the purpose of preventing or hindering the constituted authorities of any State or Territory from giving to all persons within such State or Territory the equal protection of the laws, each of such persons shall be punished.

And so forth.

In the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Tennessee an indictment was returned by the grand jury against R. B. Harris and 19 others. The fourth count of the indictment charged—

That the defendants did conspire together for the purpose of depriving said P. M. Wells, who was then and there a citizen of the United States and of the State of Tennessee, of the equal protection of the laws, in this, to wit, said Wells having been charged with an offense against the law of said State was duly arrested by said Tucker, deputy sheriff, and so being under arrest was entitled to the due and equal protection of said laws and to have his person protected from violence while so under arrest, and the said defendants did then and there unlawfully conspire together for the purpose of depriving said Wells of his right to the equal protection of the laws and of his right to be protected in person from violence while so under arrest, and did then and there deprive of such rights and protection and of the due and equal protection of the laws of the State of Tennessee by then and there and while he, the said P. M. Wells, was so then and there under arrest as aforesaid, unlawfully beating, bruising, wounding, and killing him, the said P. M. Wells, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

And so forth.

This indictment was excepted to by the defendants, as follows:

"Because the said section 5519 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in so far as it creates offenses and imposes penalties, is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and an infringement of the rights of the several States and the people thereof."

The case came up for hearing in the circuit court, with the circuit and district judges presiding. These judges were divided in their opinion as to the constitutional authority of Congress to enact this statute, and the question was certified to the Supreme Court for decision. The court, in delivering the opinion, stated:

Proper respect for coordinate branch of the Government requires the court of the United States to give effect to the presumption that Congress pass no act not within its constitutional authority. This presumption should prevail unless the lack of constituted authority to pass an act in question is clearly demonstrated. While conceding this, it must nevertheless be stated that the Government of the United States is one of delegated, limited, and enumerated powers. Therefore every valid act of Congress must find in the Constitution some warrant for its passage, etc. When, therefore, a question arises concerning the constitutionality of a particular power, the first question is whether the power be expressed in the Constitution. If it be the question is decided. If it be not expressed, the next inquiry must be whether it is properly an incident to an expressed power and necessary to its execution. If it be, then it may be exercised by Congress. If it be not, Congress can not exercise it. * * *

The demurrer filed to the indictment of this case questions the power of Congress to pass a law under which indictment was found. It is therefore necessary to search the Constitution to ascertain whether or not the power is conferred.

The learned justice quoted and discussed the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments and section 2 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States, and reviewed decisions of the Supreme Court rendered under these provisions of the Constitution, and held that there is no authority in any of the provisions of the Constitution or amendments which authorized Congress to enact the statute, that it was an invasion upon the rights of the States, and therefore an attempt at usurpation of power. Among other things, the court said:

A private person can not make constitutions nor laws, nor he can with authority construe them, nor can he administer or execute them; the only way, therefore, in which one private person can deprive another of the equal protection of the law is by the commission of some offense against the law which protects the rights of persons, as by theft, burglary, arson, libel, assault, or murder. If, therefore, we hold that section 5519 is warranted by the thirteenth amendment, we should by virtue of that amendment accord to Congress the power to punish every crime by which the right of any person to life, property, or reputation is invaded. Thus under the provisions of the Constitution, which simply abolished slavery and involuntary servitude, we should with few exceptions invest Congress with power over the whole catalogue of crimes. A construction of the amendment which leads to such a result is clearly unsound.

The fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh provisions of the bill are clearly an attempt by the Federal Government to unconstitutionally extend its iron hand between a State government and its citizens and prescribe a rule of action for the individual citizens of a sovereign State.

Commencing with the Slaughterhouse case and coming down to the present time, there is an unreversed, unlimited, and uncriticized line of decisions by our Supreme Court on the extent and limitations of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments. It is now firmly settled by these decisions that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments are prohibitions against State action alone. The fourteenth amendment provides among other things:

No (State) shall deny any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

This is a direct declaration against State action, and Congress can enforce it against the State or any officers of the State, because the officers act in behalf of the State, and their acts are the State's acts. It is possible that if the State persists in denying to persons within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law, that the Federal Government might have the Federal authority under the fourth article of the fourth section of the Constitution to declare that such offending State in practice did not maintain a republican form of government, and declare that such State was no longer a member of the Union. After which Congress might have the authority to pass direct primary legislation for the Government of the people occupying the territory of such former State; but so long as the State remains a member of this Union she is entitled to exercise all of her reserved powers unhampered, independent of the Federal Government, and in spite of any action that Congress itself may take.

FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT, ITS MEANING AND LIMITATIONS AS CONSTRUED BY OUR SUPREME COURT.

In United States v. Cruickshank (92 U. S., p. 555), in construing the fourteenth amendment and that provision of it that the proponents of this bill claim give them the constitutional warrant to pass it, to wit, that "no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law," Chief Justice Waite uses the following language:

This provision does not any more than the one which precedes it, and which we have just considered, namely, the provision prohibiting a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism; every republican government is in duty bound to protect its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power. This duty was originally assumed by the States and still remains there. The only obligation resting on the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. The amendment (fourteenth) guarantees this, but not more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of the guaranty.

Again, in United States v. Harris (106 West) Justice Wood, in rendering the opinion of the court, says:

It, the fourteenth amendment, is a guaranty against the acts of the State government itself, it is a guaranty against the exercise of arbitrary and unconstitutional power on the part of the government and legislation of the State, not a guaranty against the commission of individual offenses; and the power of Congress, whether expressed or implied, to legislate for the enforcement of such a guaranty does not extend to the passage of laws for the suppressing of crime within the States. The enforcement of the guaranty does not require or authorize Congress to perform the duty that guaranty itself supposes it to be the duty of the State to perform.

Note the closing part of this quotation, that Congress is not authorized to perform the duty that the guaranty itself supposes it to be the duty of the State to perform. In other words, Congress is without constitutional authority to enact direct and primary legislation for the government of any people in any State under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. These matters lie entirely within the sovereign right and exclusively within the jurisdiction of each State. Judge Bradley in the Civil Rights Case, which came up under an enactment of Congress providing all persons within the United States shall have equal privileges in hotels, public conveyances, places of public amusement, regardless of race or color or previous condition of servitude, and in holding that statute unconstitutional, the learned justice stated:

It is State action of a peculiar character that is prohibited by the fourteenth amendment; individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of every kind which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, or which deprives them of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or which denies to them the equal protection of the laws.

The fifth section of the fourteenth amendment provides—

Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Meaning that Congress is vested with all necessary power to enforce the prohibition on State action, that "no State shall deny to any person in its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law."

Speaking of the power of Congress to enforce this guarantee against State action, Judge Bradley in the Civil Rights Case continues and says:

To enforce what? To adopt appropriate legislation for correcting the effect of such prohibited State laws and State action, and thus to render them effectually void and inoperative; this is the legislative power conferred on Congress, and this is the whole of it. It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation, but to provide against State legislation and State action of the kind referred to. It does not authorize Congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulations of private rights, but to provide modes of redress against the operation of State laws.

From an exhaustive review of all the decisions of the United States Supreme Court on the subject under discussion, I state the following principles are firmly settled:

First. The people of the United States within any State are subject to two governments—one State, one National. The powers which one possesses the other does not. They were established for different purposes, and have separate jurisdiction. Together they make one whole and furnish the people of the United States with a complete government, ample for the protection of all their rights at home and abroad.

Second. That Congress has the constitutional authority to legislate for protection of any right secured to a citizen of a State by the Constitution and constitutional laws of the United States and that these rights are very few.

Third. That under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States Congress has the constitutional authority to pass appropriate legislation to correct the effect of State laws and State action which deny to any of its citizens the equal protection of the laws of such State and for such purpose may punish State officials as such who are guilty of such denial of the equal protection of the law. This far and no farther can Congress go.

Fourth. That Congress has no constitutional warrant to legislate for the suppression of crime within a State as attempted in this bill. That the citizen of a State must depend entirely upon the laws of the State for protection of his life, liberty, and property and pursuit and acquisition of happiness. I quote again from one of the great opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Civil Rights Case:

Civil rights, such as are guaranteed by the Constitution against State aggression, can not be impaired by the wrongful acts of individuals unsupported by State authority in the shape of laws, customs, or judicial or executive proceedings; the wrongful acts of an individual, unsupported by any State authority, is simply a personal wrong, or a crime of that individual, an invasion of the rights of the injured party, it is true, whether they affect his person, his property, or his reputation; but if not sanctioned in some way by the State, or not done under State authority, his rights remain in full force, and may presumably be vindicated by a resort to the laws of the State for redress. An individual can not deprive a man of his right to vote or hold property, to buy or sell, to sue in the courts, to be a witness or a juror; he may by force or fraud interfere with the right in a particular case; he may commit an assault against the person or commit murder, or use ruffian violence at the polls, or slander the good name of a fellow citizen; but unless protected in these wrongful acts by some shield of State law or State authority, he can not destroy or injure the right; he will only render himself amenable to satisfaction or punishment and amenable therefore to the laws of the State where the wrongful acts are committed.

When the Constitution seeks to protect rights against the discriminative and unjust laws of a State by prohibiting such laws, it is not individual offenses, but abrogation and denial of rights which it denounces and for which it clothes Congress with power to provide a remedy. The abrogation or denial of rights for which the States alone were or could be responsible was the great seminal and fundamental wrong which was intended to be remedied; and the remedy to be provided must be predicated upon that wrong. It must assume that in the cases provided for, the evil of the wrong actually committed rests upon State law or State authority for its exercise or perpetuation.

Reverting to the last eight lines in section 3 of the act—section 4 of my analysis of the bill—we find that the authors of this bill, the Republican members of the Judiciary Committee, the Attorney General of the United States and his assistant, assume that Congress has constitutional authority to prescribe the mode, method, and diligence that a State, county, or municipal officer must use in discharging the duties imposed upon such officer by the laws of his State; and if such officer fails to comply with the royal decrees of Congress in discharging his duties in a manner to please some petty Federal official, then under this bill such State official may be indicted, prosecuted in the Federal Court, and sent to the Federal prison for five years.

Again I thank God for our great Constitution of the United States, and for the great patriots and intellectual giants who adorned the bench of our Supreme Court. To eternally damn this attempted usurpation of power, I will cite you to Kentucky against Dennison, in the Supreme Court of the United States. Chief Justice Taney, in delivering the opinion of the court, used the following language:

The demand being thus made, the act of Congress declares, as does the Constitution, that "it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the State" to cause the fugitive to be arrested and secured, and delivered to the agent of the demanding State. The words "it shall be the duty" in ordinary legislation imply the assertion of the power to command and to coerce obedience. But looking to the subject matter of this law and the relations which the United States and the several States bear to each other, the court is of opinion the words "it shall be the duty" were not used as mandatory and compulsory, but as declaratory of the moral duty which this compact created when Congress had provided the mode of carrying it into execution. The act does not provide any means to compel the execution of this duty, nor inflict any punishment for neglect or refusal on the part of the executive of the State; nor is there any clause or provision in the Constitution which arms the Government of the United States with this power. Indeed, such a power would place every State under the control and dominion of the General Government, even in the administration of its internal concerns and reserved rights. And we think it clear that the Federal Government under the Constitution has no power to impose on a State officer as such any duty whatever and compel him to perform it, for if it possessed this power it might overload the officer with duties which would fill up all his time and disable him from performing his obligations to the State, and might impose on him duties of a character incompatible with the rank and dignity to which he was elevated by the State.

Section 5 of the bill imposes a penalty of $10,000 on each county in which a man may be mobbed and on each county in which or through which the victim is carried, and confers upon the Federal judge in whose court judgment may be rendered for said penalty the power to compel the tax-levying State officers of such county or counties to levy a tax upon the property of all the citizens of that county for the payment of such judgment. This provision is so manifestly unjust that I can not believe any body of intelligent, fair-minded men would sanction it. To penalize all the resident citizens of a county because of the unlawful act of five or more persons, who may not even be residents of the county in which the victim was mobbed, outrages every sense of justice and fair dealing. It would be robbery committed under the forms of law.

The Constitution of the United States in expressed terms confers upon Congress the tax-levying and collecting power, and yet, notwithstanding this expressed delegation of power to Congress, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that Congress had no constitutional right to tax the salary of the officer of a sovereign State; that the power to tax necessarily included the power to destroy, and if this power to tax the salary of a State officer were conceded to Congress, then, by the extreme exercise of such power, Congress could destroy every State government in the Union; therefore this right was denied to Congress by the court as contravening the relations of the State and Federal Government to each other and of both of these Governments to the people. As to this forfeiture there is no expressed or implied power in the Constitution vesting in Congress the right to legislate on this subject, and if Congress can constitutionally impose a penalty or forfeiture upon a State or political subdivision of a State of $10,000, then it could do likewise to the extent of a hundred thousand, a hundred million, or a billion, and thus destroy every State government in the Union, and in the language of the Supreme Court "radically change the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Government to each other, and of both of these Governments to the people."

But, reverting, Mr. Chairman, to section 2 of the bill, which provides:

That if any State or governmental subdivision thereof fails, neglects, or refuses to provide and maintain protection to the life of any person within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage, such State shall by reason of such failure, neglect, or refusal be deemed to have denied to such person the equal protection of the law of the State, and to the end that such protection as is guaranteed to the citizens of the United States by its Constitution may be secured, it is provided—

Then follows the penal provisions of this bill. I noticed in the press a few days ago that there is an organization in Chicago which covered in its operations the large cities of our country known as the "golden circle." Their business and their only business was to hold up people and rob them. They had regularly adopted rules and regulations and were to divide the spoils equally. They guard their tongue when in public places and never operate or hold up any person when they were under the influence of liquor.

If Congress possesses the constitutional authority to enact the foregoing section of this bill and if the enactment of that section confers upon Congress the constitutional warrant to pass direct and primary legislation, to punish individual citizens of a sovereign State for violating the laws of a State, then Congress would have the constitutional authority to declare that if any State or governmental subdivision thereof fails, neglects, or refuses to provide and maintain protection to the life, property, or the pursuit and acquisition of happiness of any person within its jurisdiction against the unlawful and criminal acts of any person or bands of persons contrary to the laws of such State, then such State, by reason of such failure, neglect, or refusal to provide this lawful protection, shall be deemed to have denied to the injured persons aforesaid the equal protection of the laws of said State, or said State shall be deemed to have deprived such injured person of "life, liberty, or property without due process of law," and to the end that such protection as is guaranteed to the citizens of the United States by its Constitution may be secured as it provided, then Congress would have as much right and constitutional warrant to provide an entire penal code for all offenses committed by any and all citizens of every State in the Union against the penal law of a State and the enacted penal code of Congress, and thus usurp all the reserved powers of the State over their strictly internal affairs, destroying our system of government and reducing the States to a condition of vassalage or provinces, the same status they occupied prior to the Revolutionary War, when they were dependent colonies of England.

It is useless for me to state that a revolution would follow if Congress thus followed the principles contained in this bill to their logical conclusion. This, gentlemen, is not a mere picture of my imagination. I quote from Justice Miller in the opinion of the Supreme Court, in Sixteenth Wallace, and leave it to you to draw your own conclusion:

Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment by the simple declaration that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the United States (I will add, "Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law") to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

All this and more must follow, if the proposition of the plaintiff (the proponents of this bill) be sound.

For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance limiting and restricting the exercise of power by the States in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects, and still further, such construction would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve, as consistent with those rights as existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument, we admit, is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions, when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character, when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Governments to each other and of both these Governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

To Members of Congress who earnestly and sincerely desire to comply with their oath to support and maintain the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, both foreign and domestic, further citation of authorities is unnecessary. The question in this case is whether you will support the Constitution of the United States, maintain its integrity, and preserve our Government, or whether you will depart from the path of duty, carry out the behest of the Republican platform, the instruction of a Republican President, and prostrate yourselves upon the shrine of political expediency.

Mr. Chairman, we seem to have forgotten that old historic truism, "Experience is the best teacher." Other great peoples flourished before we had verified our successful experiment of popular government by establishing the existence of the United States of America. And these experiences have exemplified for us and for our benefit many of the troubles incident to the ups and downs of national life.

The newer and improved conditions of the world's economies have blessed our people with untold opportunities; and many of the advanced steps to a better day have originated in the life work of our virile people. We have stimulated nobler impulses and better living for mankind; and our splendid achievements in government have set the universal pace. Because of a peerless past and our unexampled career in material greatness, and because of our primitive conception of efficient government by and for the common people, and for our successful construction and operation as the matchless world leader of the organized powers, we may be fatally off our guard. That old political proverb still rings its self-evident call, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." At the present time it is more true than it has ever been, and we the people are admonished by all the axioms of time to adjust and readjust ourselves to the related principles and forces of our political life and welfare.

It is comparatively unimportant to fortify against external foes. Outside enemies are not anxious to test the metal of our spirit or of our impregnable outer works. Our coast line and our rivers and mountains give us a powerful natural defense, and our inexhaustible resources guarantee the means of well-ordered and continued existence.

But, Mr. Chairman, prosperity has often proved a curse, and by that very sign the principalities and powers have gone down to destruction. The most splendid dynasties have fallen before the wiles and guiles of effeminacy, and the most powerful thrones have crumbled when luxury wielded the scepter; but more fatal than the enervating agencies of the flesh are the frailties and decay of the spirit, and the corrosion of the vitals which unconsciously sap the strength and power, and which means paralysis and inevitable death.

And more certainly fatal to the life of a people than the demoralization of sumptuous pleasures and more destructive than the insiduous virus of an incurable disease are the covert and tragic conclusions of political heresy and the dry rot of political indifference and the insinuating malice of sectional hate and partisan greed.

Under the spell of delusion and deception and partisan ambition great peoples and splendid civilizations are no more.

Egypt, the birthplace of letters, the most ancient, long-lived, and powerful nation of the primeval day, surrendered her scepter and her sword to Persia and became her vassal—a victim to her own involuntary reaction, yielding to the inevitable degeneracy of physical, moral, and intellectual degradation and spiritual death. In turn and in order Persia succumbed to the Babylonian Empire, whose wealth and magnificence and power were handed over to Assyria in the eighteenth century before Christ. The hardy Assyrians, following Egypt and Babylon in their splendors and imitating them in their degenerate decay, were overcome by the Chaldeans.

The Chaldeans did exactly as the others had done, and simply degenerated and died when the cancers of effeminate living and political depravity pronounced their doom. And so with Greece and Rome and more modern powers, who have erected their national temples and left their national cemeteries to perpetuate their memorials of glory and their confessions of inglorious defeat and suicidal death.

Mr. Chairman, do these familiar examples of ephemeral national life offer no warning to this mighty Republic of America? Is it not a plain deduction that might and power do not make immortality? Is it not a sane and sensible conclusion that the worms that infest the vitals are disastrous to life? Can we fail to see and understand that if the tried and substantial verities of our national life are undermined, the great fabric of our constitutional Government must follow the fated footsteps of the suicidal narcotic, and the self-inflicted fatalities of the mighty peoples who have perished. "What profit is it to a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" That is the warning that applies.

The dangers of the hour which threaten our Government and our people are not new; they are strikingly similar to those of other times, when the proud standards of the greatest nations have trailed to the dust in humiliation and in sorrow.

No more conspicuous example can be cited than that of the Roman Empire, whose eagles were borne by victorious legions to the supremest heights of national glory. Perhaps the greatest individual character in history was Julius Cæsar, whose heroic personality thrills the imagination of every schoolboy, and by whose leadership the proud mistress of the world has written the story of her eternal hills. Bulwer tells of the bold and brilliant and brittle populace in his surpassing story, "The Last of the Roman Tribunes," and Gibbons's "Rise and Fall of the Roman Empire" is standard history.

It is not difficult to divine the full scope and meaning of this antilynching legislation, so persistently sought by the party in power.

It belongs to that kind of political demagoguery, so dear to the malignant partisanship of the day, when the chance to wave the bloody shirt inspires the hope that some happening, good, bad, or indifferent, will serve to bolster the drooping spirits of the G. O. P., and continue without interruption the mercenary reign of foreign-relations hypocrisy and the dominating power of Newberry scandals.

Mr. Chairman, with the Republican Party platform declaring:

> We urge Congress to consider the most effective means to end lynching in this country, which continues to be a terrible blot on our American civilization—and with the President's message, April 12, 1921, insisting that—

> Congress ought to wipe the stain of barbaric lynching from the banners of a free and orderly representative democracy—

we have no misgivings as to the principles fostered in this Republican antilynching movement. It is politics and nothing but partisan politics from start to finish of the most reckless and virulent kind.

Its political aim is partisan power.
Its political motive is partisan advantage.
Its political hope is partisan privilege.
Its political fear is partisan loss.
Its political prayer is partisan votes.
Its political spirit is partisan greed.
Its political principle is sectional hate.
Its political passion is partisan life everlasting, ad infinitum, and with all the political plunder and perquisites, "for me and my wife, my son John and his wife, us four and no more"—proof, the Newberry senatorship campaign in Michigan.

It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that desperate political fear has driven the Republican Party into their hateful temper of the "bloody-shirt" régime—that disgraceful and shameful reconstruction era of "spoils and persecution."

That they are devoid of respect for the Constitution, as they have often been, note their platform appeal to Congress, and the message of the President to Congress—plain intimations that Congress shall override the "State's rights and prerogatives," as they have consistently preached and practiced whenever their day of political control suggests that the political expedient must rescue the old party of expediency.

Coming down, Mr. Chairman, to the spiritual merit of this Dyer bill and its kindred and associated measures, which constitute the summum malum of the entire dastardly budget of unpatriotic wickedness, leveled so unscrupulously at the heart of the Nation, the astounding fact is that such a practically impossible proposition can even have a day in court.

Its projectors must be a new bunch, and not that old one of reconstruction notoriety, who would know better. Certainly the force bill conspirators are not trying to rally their routed and panic-stricken degenerates to again risk the gantlet of defeat and failure. Surely the remnant of that old tribe of apostate carpetbaggers are not plotting a new incursion to Dixie. The blackened and battered homes are repaired and rebuilt and the devastated fields are fruitful again with prosperity. We are not so helpless now. We have gotten on our feet again.

And the American citizen of "African descent" has learned a little—enough to remind him of the "40 acres and a mule" that once fooled him so miserably—and he can never forget the long-drawn out farce of the "Freedman's Bureau," and the outrage of the "Freedman's Bank" still haunts his bewildered memory.

He is not so cheap a victim now as he was then. He sees better, and he even dares at times to kick to pieces the ties that bind the fellowship of his "political brother."

But, Mr. Chairman, this latest device to catch and to hold the deluded Negro vote is just another but more desperate attempt to chain him to the chariot wheel of Republican supremacy. It will fail, for there is no more sincerity in it now than when citizenship responsibilities were imposed and burdened his dull and sightless political senses.

We of the land of Dixie, long the special breeding ground of Republican shams, have had the Negro problem with us ever since he became the Republican puppet and tool, and it is exclusively upon our hands.

We have no antipathy to our Negro population. For the material welfare of the Negro there are no better friends than his white neighbors of the South.

In our great Texas Commonwealth we do all we can for his education, and his school privileges are ample and indiscriminately enjoyed at State expense. The Prairie View Normal is a comfortable and commodious and sightly State institution. It was built and furnished at an approximate cost of $1,000,000. It is operated by the State, but managed exclusively by a Negro faculty for the benefit of Negro students, and all of it at the expense of the State. The school tax is equally prorated for the public schools and for all Texas children without racial discrimination.

The Negro problem is the peculiar problem of the South. It would long ago have been solved in the best interest of both races but for the political partisan spirit of the Republican machine and the so-called white uplift organizations of the North and East who send their disturbing emissaries into the Southern States and in secret meetings of the Negro race preach the damnable doctrine of social equality which excites the criminal sensualities of the criminal element of the Negro race and directly incites the diabolical crime of rape upon white women. Lynching follows as swift as lightning, and all the statutes of State and Nation can not stop it.

But if the fair-minded element of the Republican Party and the above-mentioned uplift organizations would undertake to impress, as they can impress, upon the rank and file of the dominant agencies and the Negro race generally, the folly of fomenting discontent by awakening hopes that can not be realized in any American locality, the so-called Negro problem will be solved forever.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, the President in his message to the Congress of last week, and Mr. Hoover and his associates in their testimony before the Committee on Foreign Affairs, all dealt with the great emergency in one particular portion of Russia; that portion is a certain sector along the course of the Volga River. I do not know whether all members of the committee are entirely familiar with the location of that region; and if they are not, it occurred to me it might be of interest to them to know.

The Volga River flows from north to south pretty well over to the east of European Russia. The famine area extends on both sides of the river from the city of Kazan, one of the historical religious shrines of Russia, south past the city of Samara, and ends somewhere in the neighborhood of the city of Saratov. The distance from Kazan down to Saratov is some 300 or 400 miles, but the famine area in width is rather narrow.

The point I wish to make in indicating the location of this Volga famine region is that the region is several hundreds of miles to the east of Moscow and many more hundreds of miles southeast of Petrograd. On account of transportation conditions as they are in Russia to-day the travel time for the actual distance is, in fact, multiplied several times, so that whereas one might require 24 hours to get from Petrograd or Moscow to the famine region in normal times, the journey would now, with present transportation conditions, take a week.

Many Members of the House fear that this relief bill is going to aid the tottering bolshevik régime. Their fear is perhaps natural, but it is wholly unfounded. The fact is that if the pending bill has any political significance whatever it will tend to make the bolshevik régime totter still faster.

This region that I speak of is an agrarian region; that is, it is a farming and agricultural region, and that is why its people are so hard hit by the failure of the crops. As I have just indicated, it is a long, difficult, and prohibitively expensive journey to or from the bolshevik centers. There are few large cities in that region, and bolshevism has little or no foothold anywhere in the famine area.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I am sorry I can not.

If we can show to these stricken people that the bolshevik régime is not to be depended upon in the hour of their extreme trial; if we can convince them that their hope is elsewhere, in the great democracy across the sea, that very circumstance is going to aid them in realizing that their own well-being demands their return to a true democracy in government. The hope for a rebirth of Russia lies among the peasant and farming class, here in the Volga Basin and in similar parts of the country.

One other point is all that I have time for. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] suggested that this proposal would constitute a precedent for every kind of relief program whenever in the future there may be famine or distress anywhere in the world. I think this distinction should be made here: Where the government wherein famine or distress is present can raise money in the markets of the world on reasonable terms there is no call for the United States to step in. But in Russia there is no government which can raise money in the money markets of the world on any terms. You will go down to the restaurant to-day and spend a dollar for your lunch, perhaps; in Russia to buy that meal you would have to pay 100,000 roubles of normal value of $50,000; $50,000 worth of paper roubles for a two-course luncheon is the cost of a simple meal in Russia to-day! Of course, Russia has no international credit. We would not lend money under those conditions; no commercial nation would. And if we do not extend our aid to these starving people no one will, and they will die by the million in the coming months. I do not fear that this shall be used as a precedent in the future. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 35 minutes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this is a bill which, of course, is an appeal to our hearts, but we are not sent here to legislate on the state of our hearts. We are sent here to legislate as trustees, as the gentleman from Maryland said, for our constituents and for our country, and not as trustees to divert funds committed to our care, to be dissipated to every need of all the world.

Yesterday morning when I reached my office I found a very respectable paper on my desk, the Wateree Messenger, from the county of Kershaw, in South Carolina, one of the great and prosperous counties of the State, and in my district, with this statement:

> It is said there is plenty of food in the country, yet we know of scores of persons who have scarcely anything to eat or to wear and no money to buy these necessities. Lots of people on the farms have no means to work a crop next year; in fact, a great many persons do not yet know where they will live the coming year.

In another column I found this statement:

> Up to December 1, 1921, there were 12,400 bales of cotton ginned in this county against 30,832 for the same period of last year, a difference of 18,432 bales.

In other words, that is merely one of the symptoms that there are in this country unemployed, thrown out of work with nothing on which to live, who are dependent on the charity of the country in which they are, and who will think that we are exceedingly generous with other people's money if we give it to people three or four thousand miles away and do not attend to those who are entitled to it. You say this will not tax them; that it only is a tax of 20 cents a head. It is 20 cents a head, but it is at least a dollar a head on the head of every family, and it is more than that on the head of every man that is able to take care of those people who are around him. The people of this country who have something must take care of people who have not. If you are going to tax them you are decreasing their power to take care of the 6,000,000 unemployed people in the country.

Only yesterday it was announced that the Erie Railroad had put upon half time 5,000 employees. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad has closed its shops, and thousands of employees are going out at Christmas time with no pay check to come.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] said a few minutes ago that we have violated the Constitution so many times that it has become a precedent. In so far as I am concerned I do not propose to vote to establish any more precedents of that kind. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CANTRILL] said that this was Christmas time and we should vote it as a Christmas gift. Gentlemen, the spirit of Christmas is derived from Him for whom it is named, and He said sacrifice yourselves and not the other fellow. I never heard the doctrine that it was good to give Christmas gifts by making the other fellow pay. My wife goes downtown and gets a Christmas gift for me and charges it to me, but that is all in the family. [Laughter.] I do not propose that somebody else shall vote a Christmas gift at my expense. I do not propose to advocate the doctrine of giving Christmas gifts when there are thousands starving and crying out for bread in this country, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] said the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York said a while ago that he has been all the way to Petrograd and he knew what he was talking about. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] said that Petrograd was a thousand miles from these people, and they were not going to help the people around Petrograd, which the gentleman from New York said were starving. Hence I look for the gentleman from New York to have another bill to relieve the people of Petrograd. It is said the people are starving in Armenia and in India and other parts of Europe. If we take care of these people, we will have to take care of the people in Petrograd and people in Armenia and everywhere else, because there is more agitation to-day to have the people of Armenia taken care of than any other country in Europe.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Did I not state in answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that my idea of the bill was, as stated by Dr. TEMPLE, that it would apply to any distressed territory of the ancient Empire of Russia.

Mr. STEVENSON. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania said that it was to be limited to the people of the Volga, and so did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM], and I say it is broad enough to reach from up on the Baltic to the extreme eastern part of Siberia. You can not limit it. [Applause.]

Mr. TEMPLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, there is undoubtedly great distress to-day in the United States, but no such distress but that each locality can take care of. If the distress becomes so great that its immediate locality can not take care of it and they appeal to the United States Government, the Government will help. To-day in the United States we have millions of bushels of wheat, more than we can consume. We have millions of bushels of corn in the United States in excess of what we can possibly use. We are even burning corn for fuel in certain sections of our country, there is such an overproduction. This bill provides that the President of the United States shall purchase some of our surplus corn and surplus wheat, and also preserved milk, of which we have a surplus, and send it over to Russia and give it to the famished people of a certain district in Russia known as the Volga district. The Volga district has been one of the most fertile agricultural districts of Russia. It has a population of from 18,000,000 to 20,000,000 people. Ordinarily it raises more than enough to feed its people and exports its products, wheat and other grains, but to-day, on account of three successive droughts, the people have not raised nearly enough grain to sustain the population. The rainfall in the last year was only 2½ inches, while it ordinarily has a rainfall of 14 inches. This unprecedented drought having continued for three years, the people there are starving by the tens of thousands. The reports show that in certain children's hospitals 90 per cent of the children already there have died. These are children under 5 years of age. In children's homes where they take children from 5 to 12 years of age, 75 per cent have already died. They make an appeal to this country which I do not believe this country can afford to deny. There is no question about the facts. The passing of this bill means the saving of the lives of several million splendid people. Men like Gov. Goodrich, of Indiana, have been there, and the governor has just returned, and he tells stories that would make a man cry. He told our committee about many cases of suffering that he had seen on his recent trip of investigation in this famine district. He said that in one field along the road he saw an old gray-haired man in feeble health, and his wife bending over picking the seeds from the weeds, and that that man's children and grandchildren, three generations, were doing the same thing, bending over on their hands and knees in that field, pulling every weed for food. They got these seeds from these weeds and ground them and made bread of them. The only bread that was used by the inhabitants was bread made from the bark of trees and the seeds of weeds. He told about the little children that were dying by the thousands for want of food.

The people in this famine-stricken district are a brave peasantry, and they are making a valiant fight for their lives. A dollar and five cents will buy in the market here 60 pounds of wheat. Sixty cents will buy a bushel of shelled corn. It can be sent over there, and it will not disturb conditions here. In fact, it will benefit the people here, it will provide a market for that grain, and it will give employment to men on our railroads, it will move our empty cars and give cargoes to idle ships, and every dollar will remain in the United States. I do not believe that America can send a message to Russia and to the world that will do more good, that will make them love America and American institutions more than for America to send over at this Christmas time enough corn and wheat, seed grain, and preserved milk to save the lives of millions of children, put those people on their feet so that they can live and have seed grain enough for another year, and raise crops that will make them self-supporting.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. I think a large number of us appreciate the distressed conditions of the people in Russia, but there are a great many of us here that are somewhat disturbed about the power of Congress to lay a tax upon the people of America for this purpose. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion about that.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I think that has been answered several times to-day. Under the general-welfare clause we can go out and buy grain of our own people at any time and give it to whom we please, if it is for the general good. We have done it before, and as an example I cite the gentleman to the relief of the distressed in Messina at the time of the earthquake.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX].

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, the $100,000,000 advanced to Europe at the end of the war at the request of President Wilson was a loan. Mr. Hoover has advised the country that 65 to 80 per cent of it has been, or soon will be, repaid to us. The later act permitting the Grain Corporation to dispose of 5,000,000 barrels of its grain to European countries was in the shape of a loan. Neither of these acts were gifts as this is. I think my opposition to this bill grows out of no deafness to the appeal of distress. First and fundamentally, I do not feel authorized to use money collected for governmental purposes by the tax gatherer, backed up by fines and penalties and forfeitures, to make donations to people in other countries. We gather money from the people under our sovereign power, and we use that power in a summary way to make them pay for the support of their Government. I feel that I would be misusing that money if I use it for purposes of world charity. That is one and sufficient reason why I can not support this measure. Another is that I believe it will tend to perpetuate bolshevism in Russia. If that iniquitous system, inaugurated by a set of monsters, dies soon, it will die of its own weakness, but if the world feeds and sustains that country while it still lives under that system it will, in my judgment, be perpetuating it.

That there is much cruel selfishness among the rulers and considerable food in the very regions on which we are bestowing this bounty out of the funds of the people is shown by the following quotation from the hearings held by the committee on this very bill, Hon. James P. Goodrich, formerly governor of Indiana, being the witness:

> I heard these reports from different communes of people starving, and I knew they had food enough to prevent starving for the time being.
> I said to these folks, there were 20 or 30 in the communal hall, "I wish you would tell me why it is that where there is enough to preserve life for all of you for several months that you permit your neighbors to starve to death."
> One peasant answered the question rather slowly. He said, "You Americans do not understand. There is not enough to keep all of us until next harvest. If we divide up now and do not get help, we will all starve to death. It is better that some shall die in order that others might live."
> That was his philosophy. He told me that they had had a good bit of experience in 1891, when 300,000 died of starvation in the Volga Valley. But at any rate that was the answer, not easy for Americans to understand.

I believe it is unwise to embark upon this course. This road has no end; this hole has no bottom. Other parts of Russia outside the Volga Valley, for which this measure provides, are starving. Millions of people in China are said to be starving. Armenia we know to be starving. We had this morning a story to a committee that was most pathetic telling of Assyrian distress and starvation. Great numbers of the people there are dying. How much money are we going to take from our own people in order to feed a suffering world?

Again and again advice has come from traveling citizens, our consular agents, and from other observers in Europe that the hundreds of millions of dollars being given in public and private donations from America are being relied upon by great numbers of distressed people there, who are becoming chronic mendicants, relying upon charity, seeking to migrate to America from which so much wealth is coming, and failing to settle down to work.

I quote as a part of my remarks evidence that money is coming from Russia in many millions of dollars to the United States to help subvert the Government of the United States. The Attorney General of the United States recently published a statement as to organizations and activities of bolshevists in America. Testimony before one of the committees of the House is to the effect that there are some 1,200 such organizations in the United States, and tended strongly to show that gold is coming out of Russia to promote bolshevistic propaganda in the United States.

Mr. Carl Bruhm, head of the International Press Association, who traveled for many months in European countries during 1920 and 1921 and spent much time in northern, central, and eastern Europe, including Russia, testified before the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization on the 16th day of December, 1921, as follows:

The office (in Reval, the capital of Esthonia) is located in the old Hotel Petrograd, which building was bought by the bolsheviks. From here the Russian gold finds its way into Sweden, where it is melted and stamped with the control stamp of the Royal Swedish assay office and forwarded to the United States. The so-called high commissioner of this bureau offered me at prevailing prices 12,000 pounds rubles and 1,300 pounds of bar gold deposited in a certain bank in Sweden, and this he said was only a small portion of the gold ready to be sold. I was also told by him that the soviet government had pooled all of the jewels found in Russia and that the value of same was estimated at about $2,000,000,000 * * *.

Since then I had a visit about a month ago at my office from a man who came there, who seems to represent the soviet government, at least he says so, saying that he has 75 tons of rubles for sale, and wants to know how he can get that into the United States.

Mr. VAILE. Seventy-five tons of gold rubles?

Mr. BRUHM. Seventy-five tons of gold rubles. That represents $45,000,000. I do not see why these people want credit over there for provisions when they have their own gold to pay for it.

* * * * * * *

Mr. BOX. And that representative of that Government appeared in your office in New York?

Mr. BRUHM. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Of course, you don't know whether he was an accredited agent of that government, do you?

Mr. BRUHM. I met him in Reval. That is how he came to my office. I have seen him at the bolshevik bureau in Reval.

* * * * * * *

Mr. VAILE. Did he offer to exhibit his goods?

Mr. BRUHM. No; but after his dealings with the so-called high commissioner at the bolshevik agency in Reval—I went there because it was interesting to find out the connection of tkese people—I went there and I told him that I was in the market for gold. I said, "I know a whole lot of gold is coming into this country," and he opened up and asked me how much I would buy; how much I would pay for 1,300 pounds of bar gold and 12,000 pounds of rubles in Stockholm, deposited with the bank. * * *

Mr. RAKER. Is it your idea that they were exporting this gold from Russia?

Mr. BRUHM. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. For what purpose?

Mr. BRUHM. Of course, when I have no evidence it is perhaps too broad to say that it is for propaganda, but that is my personal opinion. * * *

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more.

Mr. BOX. All this suffering is pitiful; God knows I wish we could relieve the suffering everywhere; but if we were to do that we would utterly impoverish our own people. Let our people in their generosity and in proportion to their prosperity do that which their hearts prompt. It will not be stinted. We as the trustees of the people, charged with the duty of protecting them against wrong, ought not to permit this reckless use of money which they have put into our hands for use for the purposes of government. Especially when millions of our people are out of work and millions of all classes are in financial distress, I am unwilling to force money from them in taxes for charity in Europe. [Applause.]

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, after a great deal of thought and considerable study I have come to the conclusion that this bill should be supported. After hearing what I heard in the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, which gets the backwash from this appeal, and when we have heard both sides as to what may and may not happen, I am only sorry that the parliamentary situation is such that we are not able at this time to add another $2,000,000 to this bill for the relief of the people of all that is left of Armenia and of all that is left of Assyria.

In 1919 and again in 1920, in a former Congress, bills for the relief of starving peoples were brought in. The first, or $100,000,000, bill was for the relief of the starving people of certain of the Allies, or near allies. That bill was passed, 243 to 73. The second, or $50,000,000 flour exchange relief for Austria, was brought in in November, 1920, under a suspension of the rules, with 20 minutes of debate on a side. I took the 20 minutes in opposition to that bill. I did the best I could in opposition to it, for some of the reasons stated here now by many gentlemen and for additional reasons, including the exchange scheme, and because of the situation existing between the rural and urban populations in Austria. We know more about that situation now, and I am inclined to believe that I was right. But perhaps I was not particularly happy in what I said. It was a hard situation, and there were few votes against the measure. The vote was 285 for, 12 against. Since that time I have reflected. I have read a great deal about the situation in Russia, in the so-called Balkans, in Asia Minor, in Constantinople, and I have come to the conclusion the United States must continue to work, and work hard, to save what is left of the civilization of the world. Gentlemen, no dollar ever spent for relief by the United States as a Government and no dollar ever spent by our people as contributors to the relief of any suffering in any part of the world has ever been a mistake, or ever will be. [Applause.] For Ireland, for Cuba, for China, for earthquakes here, for famine there, it has all been noble and worthy of our great people.

As long as food is here we must help. If there is not time to organize great relief through private sources, we must do it through public sources. We will not lose. This Nation itself will gain, not only through doing good and doing right but materially.

We represent this Government and we represent districts. There is not time to have a referendum in our districts to know exactly the views of the people, and in this emergency we must act as the people would act, and I am very sure there is not one person in one thousand in the State of Washington who would deny this relief. They know of the pressure from bolsheviki government on one side, of the cruelty of the sword of Islam on the other, and of the great famine over all, which has created the situation. Constitutionally we can do it—morally we should do it. Besides, Mr. Chairman, as I stated in an interview the other day preparatory to bringing in legislation with reference to a distressing immigration situation, this Government had better try to help the people there than let them be forced out in great droves by famine, murder, and otherwise onto other countries, ultimately to be shoved onto us. We will do much better to help them just as far as we can—Government help, private help—and we must work rapidly. I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.] I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to use some time?

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, Mr. BURTON of Ohio, a member of the committee, expected to speak but was unexpectedly called away. He asked me to request leave to extend his remarks on this bill by including in such extension a list of the precedents for such action as this bill contemplates. This list will cover about a page of the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] have permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I make the same request, to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think——

Mr. TEMPLE. One moment. What was done with the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]?

The CHAIRMAN. No objection was made.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, this debate is not merely impressive; it is quite peculiar. I do not dissent from a single word that has been said on either side. Indeed, I feel the arguments offered in opposition to this bill constitute the very strongest reasons for its enactment. If I understand the course of the discussion, everybody here is anxious to see accomplished the purpose at which this bill aims. But while everyone professes the keenest anxiety to have the appalling conditions ended which this bill seeks to end, objections are made that we have no authority here to indulge in philanthrophy. Well, I agree to that. We have none whatever, if mere philanthrophy be the object. I find a cordial echo in my bosom of the remark by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] that philanthrophy and beneficence were always admirable personal qualities but never legitimate political enterprises. I agree that no man has a right to indulge in them at the expense of another or at the expense of the Treasury. That contention is absolutely unanswerable. If this proposal were merely an appeal for generosity, I would say that it was addressed to the wrong body. But I believe it is a measure of sound policy, of high policy, and not merely of high policy but of absolute necessity to the security of our civilization, which is seriously imperiled—aye, rocking on its foundations—by reason of conditions which must be remedied if it is to survive. And no one here, I venture to say, will dispute the proposition that of the civilization which we call Christian, this country is at once the bulwark and the citadel, the latest fruit and the crowning glory. No one who heard

Mr. Hoover describe the appalling destitution actually scourging the people whom this bill is intended to relieve can doubt that its failure to pass will result in their extermination—a civilization under which a whole people are allowed to perish from the face of the earth has failed of its purpose. And no civilization has ever long survived failure to perform the function for which civilization is established. Now, gentlemen say that enactment of this measure will open the door to all manner of extravagances hereafter, and that from these extravagances all manner of disasters will befall our own country. If that were so, I would oppose this bill.

I do not believe that to end an injury in one part of the world we have any right to risk the security or prosperity of this particular part of the world, which is the United States.

Gentlemen are so alarmed lest this measure might establish a new and dangerous policy that they oppose it, even while professing the utmost sympathy with its objects. There is no question of policy here, and there can be none. There is no question of precedence, and there can be none, because we are faced here with an emergency which has no precedent or parallel in the history of the whole human race. You can not deal with an emergency by following precedents or considering them. An emergency in the very nature of things is without precedents. It can neither follow precedents nor establish them. And the frightful emergency we are now considering, being without parallel or precedent in the past, it is not likely to recur in the future. Being an emergency, it must be dealt with according to its features, its own peculiar features. But I want to say now that if these frightful conditions should be repeated in the valley of the Volga or anywhere else, this country should proceed to remedy them with all the means in its power. [Applause.] That is a duty it owes to civilization, and what it owes to civilization it owes chiefly and above all to itself, the flower and center of civilization.

What is the condition with which we are confronted, Mr. Chairman? The report which accompanies this bill states it, I hope, with some degree of clearness. It is not due to any act of man. If it were the consequence of vicious or extravagant procedures by government, I think it would be our duty to tell the victims of misgovernment that they must find a remedy for the destitution affecting them in the overthrowing of the system that caused it.

I think the providence of God is shown just as clearly in the disasters which follow misgovernment as in the blessings that crown good government. It is because the fruits of government always are determined by the quality of government that men are encouraged to defend the institutions which are beneficent and urged to resist and overthrow those that are pernicious. If, therefore, these conditions of famine were consequences of misgovernment, I might oppose this bill. But we have had evidence before us to the contrary which was overwhelming. There can be no question about the accuracy of the statements made by Secretary Hoover, Gov. Goodrich, and other gentlemen who appeared before this committee. And they were unanimous in declaring that these unfortunate human beings are plunged in starvation and on the brink of extinction through no fault of the Russian Government or of the Russian people, but solely and entirely through a visitation of God. The conditions afflicting them are the products of two causes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. COCKRAN. First, there was the natural diminution of production, caused by the contributions of the country in men and foodstuffs to the armies organized by their country to take part in the greatest war ever waged on the face of this earth. That was a waste in itself sufficient to reduce seriously the volume of commodities available for support of human life. It was supplemented and aggravated by a drought lasting for three years—a drought that never had been paralleled in the experience of that country before.

The drought of the first year necessarily reduced the natural value of argicultural productions and that naturally caused some distress. The second year's drought aggravated seriously the injury produced by the first. Not merely was it more prolonged, but the supply of foodstuffs having already been lessened by the first year's drought, the suffering was greatly increased. And then, for the first time, as I say, in the history of the country, a third year of drought followed, and this practically exhausted all the sources of supply. As a consequence that land is absolutely desolate; not desolated by war or through abandonment of cultivation by the inhabitants, as has frequently happened in human history, owing to taxation so oppressive that it deprived them of any chance to enjoy that which they might have produced, but desolated by the hand of Almighty God, desolated so completely that unless this country affords relief the land can not be planted and extinction of the people is inevitable. From no other source can relief come. When Mr. Hoover and the other witnesses who had visited this land of suffering came before us they asked only $10,000,000, but on examination by members of the committee they were compelled to admit that this sum would merely feed the people actually starving now; it would not suffice to afford means of planting the soil so that promise of a harvest next year sufficient to support the population would be afforded. But with $10,000,000 additional not merely would relief from actual starvation be made complete but planting implements and seeds could be supplied sufficient to afford the people a chance once more to live by the products of labor exercised on their own soil. And more than that, this relief would quicken the whole industrial life of the country.

Revival of that basic industry, agriculture, in a most important and productive area of the world would stimulate enormously the revival of trade and prosperity everywhere. Production begins at the soil. The fruits of industry exercised on the earth are the basis of all the manufactures which make active the processes of exchange. And so it is reasonable to assume that in banishing starvation from this sorely afflicted region we may afford its inhabitants an opportunity to render service of surpassing value to the whole world while at the same time effecting regeneration of their own country.

The report also shows clearly that there is no reason whatever to apprehend that any part of this relief, if it is afforded, may be diverted to support of the Russian Government or to benefit it in any way.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know what a bolshevist is. If I did I would perhaps be no less vehement than these gentlemen who denounce them. All I know is this, whatever the present government of Russia may be, it is there. Mr. Hoover and all the other witnesses who have been engaged in distributing relief afforded by American private charity concur in saying that the Government has aided them in every way and so effectively that not a pound of food has been lost or misapplied in transit. So whatever we may think of soviet officials, it is an undisputed fact that they have had nothing to do with these conditions. Mr. Chairman, the simple fact that confronts us is this: A people are starving before our eyes. Unless we give them relief they must disappear under conditions too awful to describe or even to conceive. What is our duty, not alone to these unfortunates but to ourselves? When famine starts pestilence follows always fast upon its heels. Soon it will be finishing the desolation of the country unless we intervene to stop it.

Do gentlemen think if pestilence starts in one part of the world that they can localize it, arrest it at our own frontiers, and keep it from desolating this land of ours which we are sworn to guard? I am not invoking philanthropy, though it is not necessary to argue it when considering the interests of our own country. Thank God, philanthropy is always included within the scope of duty to American patriotism. And let us not hesitate for a moment over constitutional objections. Our Constitution never yet has prevented this country from rendering any service to humanity that Providence enabled it to perform. Let us not allow it now to be invoked successfully to stay the hand of charity and relief when preservation of an important part of the human family may be at stake, or to prevent us from bringing relief to the uttermost ends of the earth wherever the hand of God rests heavily upon His creatures. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, such appeals as that of the eloquent gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] make it certainly very difficult to vote against this bill. If there were not strong considerations the other way, there are none of us who would decline to vote for it. But there are such considerations that make it not only difficult but impossible for some of us to support it.

Now, referring to the remarks of one of the gentlemen a while ago, I am not a very strict constructionist. I rather incline to liberal construction. I go to the point of justifying appropriations that have been made without specific authority except that contained in the common defense and general provisions of Article I. Thus I am assuming that we can use the money in the Treasury for the purpose of maintaining the common defense and the general welfare of the United States itself. That is a latitudinarian view. That is the view that was entertained and expressed by Story, who was confessedly one of the greatest commentators on the Constitution. He was of the Federalist school. But Judge Story himself in effect condemned such action as is proposed to be taken here to-day. Having said that Congress can make appropriations of a domestic character with a view of maintaining the common defense or promoting the general welfare, he further said, in substance, that Congress can not go beyond that and make appropriations for purposes extraneous to this country. As I said a while ago, and it is quite significant, when the great lawyer who now presides over the State Department appeared in the Supreme Court to contend for the constitutionality of the farm loan act, he quoted Story as presenting the most helpful and authoritative view of the power of Congress to appropriate the public revenue that has been offered.

Now, there is reference to precedents——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Gentlemen talk about precedents. Would it help us, sworn as we are to uphold the Constitution, if there were a great number of precedents that were in favor of this measure? It would not; but as a matter of fact the precedents are so meager that the maxim de minimis non curat lex almost applies to them. The donations of any consequence that have been given by this Government to the peoples of other nations were given during the World War, and everybody knows without any detail or any argument that the power that can be exerted by our Government during the period and stress of war is very different from the power that can be exerted in times of peace. The war power is, so to speak, the medicine of the Government. But who would say that the medicine of the Government can be made its daily food? And if now we are to act on the strength of precedents that are connected with transactions that took place during the war how far will we go? Where will we stop?

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. The Messina relief was not given during the war.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The Messina relief was prior to the war and it was comparatively small.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. It was $800,000.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It was not contested. It was $800,000 and not contested. I firmly believe that if a judicial test could be made, in the event this bill becomes a law, by an injunction being brought against the disbursing officers of the Government, it would result in the view being approved that I take the liberty of expressing, and place a check upon our inclination to forget the letter and the spirit of the Constitution. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has 11 minutes left.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARRETT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall consume the three minutes allotted to me, because no one would attempt to enter into a constitutional discussion of this or any other question in three or five minutes. That is not the question that is worrying me at this time.

The question that is worrying me is the suffering of humanity all over the earth, everywhere. The question that is disturbing me now is not only the suffering in Russia and Armenia and all Europe, but also in these United States of ours. [Applause.] I want to call the attention of the House at this time to one very solemn fact. That is, that the Committee on Military Affairs on yesterday reported a resolution to direct the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service to furnish ex-service men in the United States Public Health Service hospitals not now receiving compensation with necessary clothing for the coming winter. In the city of Houston, at Camp Logan, where ex-service men of the World War from three or four different States are assembled, the representative of the Red Cross at that hospital wrote me that there were 40 ex-service men in that camp who did not have sufficient clothing at this time to make them comfortable. An ex-service captain wrote me that many of the men at Camp Logan were not sufficiently clad that they could attend the Red Cross hut gathering where the people had assembled to give them entertainment; and I want to say here and now that I am going to call upon the chairman of the Committee on Rules, if necessary, to give me a rule on that resolution, in order that we may have relief now at least for the boys who offered their lives in defense of their country. [Applause.]

As to the question now before the House, if I must decide as to whether or not I shall vote yea or nay in the matter of saving starving mothers and children by the thousands and tens of thousands in stricken Russia and Armenia who are not in any way responsible either for their own sad condition or that of their government, I shall vote for the perishing women and children and take the consequences. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN].

Mr. MCSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I am not insensible to the quality of the appeal made to the hearts of us as men, but I submit that that appeal is made to us as individuals and not as Representatives. As a citizen of this country I am willing not only to give out of my own pocket dollar for dollar in proportion to my ability with any other Member here but also with any other citizen to relieve the distressed anywhere on the face of the globe and to extend the cause of humanity and of Christianity anywhere. I am not only willing to give the price of a bushel of corn but I will go further, and am not speaking facetiously when I say I am willing to give the price of a gallon of corn.

But, Mr. Chairman, the question here is one of official duty, and I believe the gentleman from Virginia is right when he says that a taxpayer will have the right to go into the courts yonder and enjoin the expenditure of a single dollar of the appropriation contained in this bill. I believe some of them will do it, because, gentlemen, the time was a few years ago when it made no difference to the people back home how Congress spent the money, because the people back home did not know where the money came from. The revenues of the Government were then raised by indirect taxes. The more Congress spent the better people liked it. The more appropriations we got to be spent in our districts for any kind of a mudhole under the pretense of river and harbor appropriation the better the people liked it. But not so now in the days of direct taxes. Mr. A and Mr. B, who have now got to go down into their pockets for Uncle Sam's budget, are demanding to know how the money is spent and where it is spent, and I tell you gentlemen that some of the men who are having to borrow the money to pay their taxes this year will appear in the Supreme Court to enjoin the disbursement of this money on the ground that Congress has exceeded its constitutional power.

Further than that, gentlemen, in order to be consistent you must accept the amendment that will be proposed giving relief to Armenia in order that she, too, may share in this beneficence. This appeal is made to the brotherhood of man, and Armenia, the oldest Christian nation on the face of the globe, is entitled to our consideration. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TEMPLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW].

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is a day when the country has the right to expect of us careful scrutiny of all expenditures. I think it is expected of us that we shall save every dollar we can and that we shall cut every appropriation as short as possible, and otherwise help the people of this country who are in sore business straits, to help them to keep going. But there are times, even when the pull is hard, when we ought to reach out. It is well enough to be thrifty and we want to be. It is a fine thing to pick up material wealth and add to our resources and husband our savings, but for what purpose in the last analysis? To do some good with what we get together, to be in a position whether as individuals or as a country to reach out and help the weaker brothers. If this discussion to-day is to fall on the constitutionality of this question, God forbid that I ever enter that field. If it is a question of placating some imaginary future government in Russia in order to get business from them or in order to establish pleasant diplomatic relations there, I say "Pooh, pooh to that!" but if it is a question of aiding a starving people through the generous hearts of the people of a country like ours, which is not on the verge of starvation, which is not going bankrupt to-morrow; if it is a question of giving a little of what we have to do the last thing which can be done for human beings, namely, to save their lives, then let us pull a little harder and let the coat shine a little brighter in order that we may do that good. [Applause.]

I wish to add one more idea of what should be accomplished by this resolution. It is said that the money will be spent in a certain little district in Russia which is very deserving, but right alongside, within easy transportation, is a little republic, a little Christian country which has reached out to America from the first day until this minute. They have sent over here tens of thousands of the best European people who have come into our midst. They have assimilated well, they have not filled our jails, they have not been bomb throwers, they have not been the kind that is stirring up the country from the bottom and seeking to ruin it. They have tried to be of use, they have been starving, not by their own fault, not particularly by the drouth of this year, but by devilish treatment by their neighbors for many years. They are hungry now. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. I refer to Armenia, and I hope the legislation will include them.

By unanimous consent, Mr. WINSLOW had leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. TEMPLE. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

THE 50 PER CENT SURTAX.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, the press has indulged in a lot of captious and sarcastic generalization about the Senate 50 per cent surtax imposed on incomes over $200,000 in the new revenue act, known as the "revenue act of 1921." As a rule such editorial criticism gives little information, analysis, or comparison of the difference between the Senate rate of 50 per cent and the rejected proposed House rate of 32 per cent, which all applauded. The authors of much of this criticism are content to indulge their irony in such sarcastic references as "swat the rich," and to stigmatize the House supporters of the Senate rate as "demagogues."

The fact that 646,582 surtax payers with incomes between $5,000 and $68,000 per annum out of the total number of surtax payers of 657,659 got no reduction in their surtaxes in the House bill but got such reductions in the Senate bill, is seldom commented upon.

The fact that all surtax payers having incomes under $86,111.11 received greater reductions in taxes in the rates adopted than in the House bill is seldom mentioned.

Let us examine the difference between the rejected House bill rate of 32 per cent and the adopted Senate rate of 50 per cent.

It will be remembered that the House bill fixed the maximum surtax rate at 32 per cent on incomes over $66,000 and retained the surtax brackets of the revenue act of 1918 under $66,000.

The Senate bill fixed the maximum surtax rate at 50 per cent on incomes over $200,000 and lowered the bracket rates of the revenue act of 1918. The House on November 17 adopted the Senate rate.

In my remarks in the House on November 17 last I erroneously credited the proposed House rate of 32 per cent with some reductions in surtaxes on incomes between $5,000 and $68,000 per annum, but as a matter of fact corrected tables show that the House bill made no reduction in surtaxes on any income between $5,000 and $68,000, but, on the contrary, the House bill left such incomes to bear much of the load of the shift of surtaxes necessitated by the proposed reductions in the House bill for incomes of $100,000 and over.

This means that 646,582 surtax payers were wholly overlooked and absolutely ignored in the proposed reduction of surtax rates in the House bill, while at the same time out of the total number of surtax payers, to wit, 657,659, only 11,077 were given reductions in their surtaxes by the House bill; furthermore, in the House bill there was no appreciable reduction made in surtaxes until incomes of $100,000 and over were reached, the number of such incomes of $100,000 and over being about 5,526.

The latest figures available for the number of surtax payers are found in the "Statistics of income" for the year ending December 31, 1919, issued July 12, 1921, by D. H. Blair, Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

From this document it appears that there are 657,659 persons with incomes in excess of $5,000, and therefore subject to surtaxes. From the same document and from additional information furnished me by the Treasury Department it appears that there are approximately 646,582 persons paying surtaxes on incomes between $5,000 and $68,000.

These 646,582 payers of surtaxes were entirely overlooked and ignored in the proposed reduction of surtaxes in the House bill, because they got no reduction on surtaxes in the House bill.

These 646,582 surtax payers were left to bear the burden of war-time surtaxes so that incomes over $68,000, and particularly incomes over $100,000, might have greater relief.

The Senate bill gave all a reduction. It thus not only remedied this neglect of 646,582 surtax payers by giving them the reduction shown in the tables which I shall insert in the RECORD, but the Senate bill also made greater reductions than the House bill in surtax rates on all incomes between $68,000 and $86,111.11, on which last-mentioned income the surtax is the same in the House and the Senate bill.

The consummation of this reduction in the House on November 17 is characterized in some quarters as demagoguery.

The Senate bill also greatly reduced the surtaxes as compared with the old law on the larger incomes.

The table hereinafter printed, marked Exhibit A, shows the reduction to taxpayers having incomes between $6,000 and $68,000 by the adoption of the Senate surtax rate of 50 per cent:

EXHIBIT A.

Saving to taxpayers as the result of fight in the House for 50 per cent surtax on incomes over $200,000.

Taxpayers having incomes as listed below were saved the following amounts in the House as the result of the adoption of the 50 per cent surtax instead of the House provision of 32 per cent on incomes over $68,000. The figures are for a married man or woman without considering additional exemption for children or dependents.

Income.	Saving in taxes.
$7,000	20
$8,000	30
$10,000	70
$12,000	110
$16,000	190
$18,000	230
$20,000	270
$22,000	290
$24,000	310
$26,000	330
$28,000	350
$30,000	370
$32,000	390
$34,000	390
$36,000	410
$38,000	430
$40,000	450
$42,000	470
$44,000	490
$46,000	510
$48,000	530
$52,000	570
$54,000	590
$56,000	610
$58,000	630
$60,000	650
$62,000	670
$64,000	690
$66,000	710
$68,000	730

Had the House surtax rate of 32 per cent prevailed, the above incomes would have had to pay in additional taxes the amounts set opposite.

In addition to the reductions shown in the table marked "Exhibit A," the adoption of the Senate provision made the following additional reductions, as compared with the House bill for the 3,800 incomes between $70,000 and $86,000:

Income.	Saving in taxes.
$76,000	610
$78,000	530
$80,000	430
$82,000	310
$84,000	170
$86,000	10

The above reductions are manifest from the table which I shall print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, marked "Exhibit B," prepared at my request by Joseph S. McCoy, Government actuary of the Treasury Department.

The extreme right-hand column, under the caption "Saving in taxes," shows the reduction in surtaxes by the Senate rate as compared with the House bill on incomes of $86,000 and under. The same column under the caption "Increase in taxes" shows increases in surtaxes in the Senate bill over the House bill.

GOVERNMENT ACTUARY, TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, December 9, 1921.

Hon. NICHOLAS J. SINNOTT,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Inclosed herewith is statement showing the saving to taxpayers as the result of the adoption of the revenue act of 1921 with 50 per cent surtax on incomes over $200,000, as compared with H. R. 8245, as originally passed by the House of Representatives with the maximum surtax rate of 32 per cent.

Respectfully,

JOSEPH S. MCCOY,
Government Actuary.

EXHIBIT B.

[1] Increase in taxes as compared with House bill.

The following table made from the Government actuary's table, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD October 21, 1921, on page 7352, shows very substantial reduction in surtaxes on incomes of $90,000 and over by the Senate bill as compared with the old law, and also the reductions that would have been made had the House bill rates prevailed:

Income.	Reduction in Senate bill now the law.	Reduction if the House bill rate had prevailed.
$100,000	1,050	2,720

Inasmuch as it has been repeatedly claimed that the 50 per cent surtax rate is a great obstacle to the sale of railroad trust certificates, the following statement, issued for the press December 2, 1921, by Eugene Meyer, jr., managing director of the War Finance Corporation, showing a recent sale of $12,842,300 of such trust certificates is of interest, together with the fact that the railroad refunding bill, designed to facilitate such sales, has been abandoned.

STATEMENT FOR THE PRESS.

WAR FINANCE CORPORATION,
December 2, 1921.

Eugene Meyer, jr., managing director of the War Finance Corporation, to-day made the following statement:

"The Director General of Railroads has, with the consent of the President, confirmed additional sales, at par plus accrued interest, of railroad equipment trust certificates now held by the Government, as follows:

To a syndicate consisting of the Guaranty Co. and Potter Bros. & Co., of New York; the Union Trust Co. of Pittsburgh; the First Trust & Savings Bank of Chicago; the Fifth-Third Bank of Cincinnati; and the Union Trust Co. of Cleveland:
Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis, 1923 to 1935, inclusive		$4,507,100
To the Illinois Trust & Savings Bank, the Merchants' Loan & Trust Co., the First Trust & Savings Bank, and the Continental & Commercial Trust & Savings Bank, all of Chicago:
Delaware & Hudson, 1922 to 1927, inclusive	$1,592,400
New York Central, 1925 to 1927, inclusive	2,768,100
Chicago & North Western, 1925 to 1927, inclusive	1,994,700

"The total amount of equipment trust certificates sold by the Government to date, at par plus accrued interest, is $132,910,600.

"With reference to the sale of railroad equipment trust certificates to the syndicate of Chicago banks, totaling $8,335,200, it is interesting to note that the investment demand for these securities, which at first was confined to the eastern territory, is gradually spreading westward. It appears to indicate that the general improvement in money market conditions is following precedent, and is gradually moving westward. It means that there will be a better market for farm mortgages in the not distant future, and that the agricultural sections will soon begin to feel the benefit of improving financial conditions."

The following reprint in the Washington Post of December 13, 1921, of an article from the New York Times shows that the country is not entirely going to the "bowwows" on account of the passage of the revenue bill with the Senate maximum surtax rate of 50 per cent on incomes over $200,000:

WHAT OTHER PAPERS SAY.

THE ACTIVE BOND MARKET.

[New York Times.]

The stock exchange bond sales last month were the largest ever known. They are perhaps doubled by the private sales "over the counter," which are in a larger proportion than usual, with no authoritative figures available. Beyond doubt the country has all the money or credit it needs, the latter being visible in unprecedented, monumental, even excessive amounts. There were just such bond booms in 1898, 1904, 1908, 1915. Even the shortest memories ought to recall such modern instances. It is no task at all to apply their significance to the interpretation of the present situation and outlook. Each of the four bond booms preceding the present followed a collapse in trade, recalled by the significant years 1897, 1903, 1907, and 1914. Also, each of the bond booms preceded revival of prosperity. Money discouraged in trade experiences sought safety, first of all, with such income as might be available while hopes of profit through enterprise were reviving. That is the present stage.

It is not to be expected that there will be forthwith a trade boom to match the bond boom. Trade and bond booms do not travel hand in hand. They move tandem, and each thrives on what is taken from the other. But nothing is lost in the process of the economic parade. There is no discouragement in the fact that money for enterprise is not in such demand as money for investment, and that loans are shrinking even while bank figures show excessive reserves and despite falling discounts. More billions await employment for profit than are now bidding for safety rather than profit. When the bond demand is sated, as some time it will be, there will be really cheaper commercial money, and scanners of the skies for income larger than now is obtainable consistent with safety will then bid for money to put into new industrial enterprises.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MILLSPAUGH].

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, if under the rule I were accorded the time I would be glad to follow the argument that has been made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE]. I understand that he will offer an amendment to include Armenia, and if this bill is to pass by all means his amendment should be adopted.

Forced, then, by lack of time I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

[By unanimous consent Mr. FULMER had leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.]

Mr. FULMER. I agree with my colleague from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN] and call your attention to my remarks along this line in my speech of August 20 on the floor of this House.

Our people are reading and thinking for themselves more than ever in the history of the country, and I believe I am voicing their thoughts and speaking their minds when I say that Congress is too prone to vote taxes upon an already heavily tax-burdened people and that the time is coming when the great masses will rise up and demand more constructive legislation for America and Americans.

Mr. TEMPLE, who introduced this bill, touches a very tender place in my heart when he makes such a forceful plea for starving Russians, and only the strong gripping that I throw about myself when I visualize the actual want that exists in my section, and the positive inability of many of my people to secure cash even for the payment of taxes and interest on loans, makes me withstand that plea. I know those poor people are suffering unto starvation and death and my heart bleeds for them. If my vote touched only myself, God knows I would not hesitate, but would joyfully agree.

At home I have been an active worker and a fairly liberal giver from my own pocket for such causes, and I feel that this should be a personal call; so I feel that I have no authority from my people to vote on South Carolina nearly one-third of a million dollars of additional taxes, when I know that in my district there are those who are not planting wheat and oats because they have not got the money wherewith to pay for the seed, and that the little seed that is allotted me as a Member of Congress for distribution will prove a boon to many families; and when I know that there are those whose property will be sold for taxes and that they can not stand a cent more of taxation; and that a great many do not know where they will get bread from for next year, on account of restricted credits by merchants and banks, caused by the bad financial conditions in the South.

And so, I say, if I were voting for myself only I would unhesitatingly vote for the bill; but, as it taxes additionally those who have no money with which to pay present taxes and buy necessities, be they ever so willing, I must regretfully vote against it. I am strengthened in that decision by the statement from the author of the bill [Mr. TEMPLE], who tells me that the committee will make a point of order against the amendment to include the Armenians, and by the further feeling, gained from the legal argument of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] that the bill is not constitutional.

I hold in my hand a resolution adopted by the South Carolina State Baptist Convention, in session at Greenville a few days ago, heartily approving of the purpose and program of the Near East relief in behalf of starving Armenian children and protesting to our Government against allowing such conditions to exist without protest. I place these resolutions in the RECORD and hope that Members of the House will read them and give them serious thought:

Resolutions of South Carolina Baptist Convention.

Whereas the truth of the reported massacres and other atrocities from which the Armenian people have suffered at the hands of the Moslems, and the great destitution resulting therefrom, has been clearly established; and

Whereas the people of South Carolina are deeply impressed by the deplorable conditions of insecurity, starvation, and misery in which Armenians still continue; and

Whereas it will be impossible for those people to raise any crops until late next summer, as the Turks have just been driven out; and

Whereas unless relief continues to come from America (the only civilized nation able to give it), thousands of Armenians will starve and freeze to death this winter; and

Whereas the Near East Relief is now caring for 110,000 Armenian orphan children and would care for that many more if they had the facilities and the money; and

Whereas the sole excuse given for the Turks for their barbarity is that for 1,000 years the Armenian Nation has steadfastly refused to renounce Christ and all that he stood for and become Mohammendans: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Baptist State Convention of South Carolina, go on record as heartily approving the purpose and program of the Near East Relief to save the lives of orphaned children and secure the release of imprisoned womanhood from Turkish harems and their restoration to their families, with a view to the rehabilitation of these nations; and

That we, the servants of Him who gave a large part of His time to physical ministry, approve and indorse the appeal of the Near East Relief as worthy of the sympathetic cooperation of every individual and organization in our churches; and

That we go on record as protesting to the United States Government against allowing such a condition to exist without protest to the Government of Turkey and making representations to have such outrages against the oldest Christian nation in the world stopped.

M. C. ALLEN, Secretary.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I have not an opportunity to say all that I would like to, and hence ask permission to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, for information of Members of the Congress and others concerned, I desire to state that I have to-day introduced a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution. If adopted, it will distribute representation among the several States on the basis of citizenship. It will also enable reduction of representation to such an extent that a House of 400 Members would afford approximately the same per capita representation as the present with 435. Such reduction would be made possible in that it would eliminate aliens from consideration in making a basis for representation.

The present method of apportioning representation contained in section 2, Article XIV of amendments to the Constitution, provides that it shall be on the basis of population excluding Indians not taxed.

The term "Indians not taxed" does not mean that Indians are not to be taxed, and are therefore not to be taken into consideration in making an apportionment, but it means that Indians who are not subject to tax, such as have tribal relation, and so forth, are not to be considered in making the apportionment.

It is difficult to ascertain the exact number of aliens residing in the United States at the date of adoption of our Constitution, but it is certain that the number was exceedingly small. The first definite information which I have been able to obtain is disclosed by the census of 1820, some 30 years after the adoption of the Constitution. At that time the population of the United States was 9,639,453, of which number 53,687 were aliens. Thus it will be seen that the percentage of our alien population in 1820 was a little more than one-half of 1 per cent; such a negligible number that framers of the Constitution evidently deemed it a matter of little or no consideration. But with the passing of years it has so increased that it must now be regarded as alarming.

The census of 1920 gives our foreign-born population as 13,920,692—nearly 14,000,000. Of this number only 46.6 per cent are shown to have been naturalized. Thus, it will be seen that according to census of that date 53.4 per cent of our foreign-born population may be regarded as alien. Since date of the last census, and up to June 30 of this year, there had been admitted into the United States 1,489,701 immigrants, making our total foreign-born population on that date 15,410,393, practically 15,500,000.

Between date of last census and September 30 of this year there had been naturalized 283,874, making our alien population on that date 8,633,431. From this it will be seen that while the percentage of our alien population in 1820 was about one-half of 1 per cent, it is to-day more than 8 per cent.

The seriousness of the situation becomes all the more appalling when we consider that to-day our adult population—that is, persons more than 21 years of age—is in round numbers 60,000,000, and of this number more than 10 per cent are alien. They are here among us, assisting in the shaping of our institutions and determining the destiny of this Nation. The vast majority of them are either deemed unfit for citizenship or do not desire it. I submit that the number is so large as to constitute a pending menace to our Government, and should not be considered in fixing our ratio of congressional representation. The present method results in giving undue representation to some States and withholding it from others.

The principle which I now advocate was well recognized in the formation of our Constitution. It is contained in Article I, section 2, paragraph 3, of the Constitution. It was under this provision of the Constitution that representation was made prior to the adoption of the fourteenth amendment in 1868. It reads as follows:

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons.

The term "three-fifths of all other persons" included the slave population of the Nation, who were not considered as citizens but were given 60 per cent representation as compared with citizens in fixing ratio for representation.

Under provisions of the fourteenth amendment former slaves were given a citizenship status, and hence were accorded equal consideration with other citizens.

Our slaves were in most cases American born. They owed allegiance to no other country. They knew little or nothing of the form of government in other countries, and as a rule cared less. I submit that their status was such that they were more worthy of consideration in fixing a basis for representation than are the great masses of aliens who are in our country to-day, not for purpose of becoming citizens, but to exploit our industries.

According to the census of 1870, which may be taken as the date of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, more than 14 per cent of our population were foreign born. The percentage at this time is about the same, but in 1870 82 per cent of our foreign-born population were citizens, while to-day only about 45 per cent are citizens. In 1870 only 18 per cent of our foreign-born population were aliens; to-day about 55 per cent are aliens. The immigrants of 1870 manifesting a love for our country and its institutions were naturalized and became good citizens. Many of them were pioneers of the great West.

I am entering no protest at this time against immigrants or our foreign-born population, but I do protest against foreigners coming into this country and refusing to become citizens. This country should be no asylum for aliens; it should be a home for American citizens.

So far as I am able to ascertain, similar conditions exist in no other country of the civilized world. Let us compare the alien population of a few countries:

1. United States, 8,633,421 (more than 8 per cent). Excluding those who have taken out first papers, it is more than 6⅔ per cent.
2. France, 1,415,128 (3.7 per cent—0.037).
3. Great Britain, 309,569 (a little more than seven-tenths of 1 per cent—0.0072).
4. Belgium, 28,242 (a little more than three-tenths of 1 per cent—0.0036).
5. Italy, 79,756 (a little more than two-tenths of 1 per cent—0.0021).
6. Japan, 20,793 (three-hundredths of 1 per cent—0.0003).

I have been unable to get the percentage in either Russia or Germany, but Russia is very small and Germany is about the same as that of France.

At my request the Census Bureau has prepared an apportionment of congressional representation on the basis of population, excluding aliens, persons whose citizenship is unknown, and Indians not taxed. The calculation is made upon an assumed House membership as follows: 400, 410, 435, 460, and 483. Incorporated in my remarks will be found the tabulation of figures submitted by the Census Bureau, from which it will be seen that a House with a membership of 400 will afford per capita representation of 245,524. This is about the same per capita representation that would be given under the present system with a House membership of 435. It will be seen that a membership of 435, apportioned in accordance with the method which my plan suggests, would decrease the representation of only eight States. Two of these would be reduced by the present method, assuming an apportionment upon the basis of 435.

I trust the Members will consider the suggested plan, and feel sure that, if adopted, it will prove both equitable and beneficial to the entire country.

Apportionment of 400, 410, 435, 460, and 483 Representatives on the basis of population after excluding aliens, persons whose citizenship is unknown, and Indians not taxed.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of these gentlemen?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for nine minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I think that the debate has made very clear the fear that some Members have of setting a precedent here which might prove injurious to us or embarrassing. I have been making an effort to find out why the bill does not limit the appropriation or the application of the funds to that portion of Russia that suffers from what under the law would be called an act of God. I have talked with some who will be responsible for the administration of it, and have been told that the purpose of the measure is to limit it to that particular area. I can find no reason, and none has yet appeared, why it is not so limited in the terms of the bill. I shall offer an amendment to so limit its application.

There is no question about our right, if we follow precedent, to assist suffering people in our own country. That has been done over and over again, always with the plaudits of the people. There is no question either, if you measure it by what we have done, as to our authority to assist people outside of our own country where the injury occurred by some great holocaust for which nobody was responsible, such as in the case of the serious earthquake which took place in the memory of all of us. This was a catastrophe that could not be avoided. Not only did we at that time vote an appropriation for assistance, but we voted an appropriation to be used for the construction of houses in that stricken country. The question was raised at that time in respect to our right under the Constitution to do that; it went through with very little objection.

I do not think anybody would seriously question our right, although I admit that it is a close question, to succor a population in some particular section of the world that is suffering because of what under the law we would call an act of God. I limit the benefit to that category. When we have presented to us the actual facts that are taking place over in the Volga country, it would take a heart of stone to close up our sympathy, or even to reduce it to a point where we would feel free to vote against such a measure if we protect the country against all sorts of claims for such succor. I am told that thousands upon thousands of children in this Volga region have been abandoned to die by parents who could not feed them. The most gruesome, unspeakable, indescribably serious condition that anyone can imagine is taking place over there, and it seems to me that we are not straining even the constitutional point to grant relief to those people. I respect very greatly, as do all Members on the floor of the House, the opinion of our good friend from Virginia [Mr. MOORE]. Yet it seems to me that with the situation as it is and with the precedents that we have before us, situations similar in character but nothing like it in degree, that we should not hesitate very long about voting some succor to these people under the limitation I have presented. For I do think that it will be in order to seriously consider whether this assistance is to be indiscriminate in regard to all of the people or to the people who might be suffering in any section of either Russia or Europe. I think that is a serious situation.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. The distinguished member of the committee from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] tells me that in the course of the hearings Mr. Hoover suggested it would be limited to the Volga Valley, but that that suggestion was rejected, and that in the framing of the bill it was so that the assistance should be extended to the whole of what was formerly the Empire of Russia, wherever the area shows a distress and that need is necessary.

Mr. FESS. If I knew that this relief is not to be limited, but to be administered without regard to the people or how they came to this situation, I would vote against it for that reason. If you open the door wide to the assistance of any portion of the population now suffering, from whatever source the suffering may come, there is absolutely no limit as to where we are going. If we here propose to salvage all Europe it is necessary to succor our own suffering first.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Suppose that in the Republic of Georgia, or a little Christian republic like the Republic of Armenia, children are being abandoned by their parents, also in the Republic of Lithuania, not any one of them parts of the Volga Valley and not now parts of the Russian Empire, would the gentleman deny assistance to them upon geographical grounds?

Mr. FESS. I would answer that when the bill was presented to take care of those specific places. I would want to go into it and see first the condition and why.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. May I suggest that no such bill will ever be brought in.

Mr. FESS. Here is the difficulty. There is no time in the world when there is not suffering, and your plea would see no end to our calls from the Old World.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized, through such agency or agencies as he may designate, to purchase, transport, and distribute corn, seed grain, and preserved milk for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia and for spring planting in areas where seed grains have been exhausted. The President is hereby authorized to expend or cause to be expended, out of the funds of the United States Grain Corporation, a sum not exceeding $20,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

Several gentlemen rose.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CONNALLY of Texas: At the end of the paragraph add the following amendment:

"Provided, That the President shall report to Congress on or before the first Monday in December, 1922, a report of the expenditures and operations of such agents or agencies as he may designate hereunder, and a report as to the disposition by the American Relief Administration in Russia of the food and grain and money which may be given under the control of said administration by reason of this act."

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment so that the word "report" will not appear twice and use the word "make" the first time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as will be reported by the Clerk.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss this amendment at length——

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has not been recognized yet. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the President shall make report to Congress on or before the first Monday in December, 1922, an account of the expenditures and operations of said agency or agencies as he may designate, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification?

Mr. TEMPLE. I would like to hear the whole text instead of "et cetera."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the entire amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the President shall make report to Congress on or before the first Monday in December, 1922, an account of the expenditures and operations of said agency or agencies as he may designate hereunder, and a report as to the disposition by the American Relief Administration in Russia of the food and grain and money which may come under the control of said administration by reason of this act.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the amendment except——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. In a moment—except to say that in an expenditure involving this large amount it seems to me that it is proper that Congress should have some report as to the expenditures of the fund which we appropriate. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman has yielded to me.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I understand I still have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas still has the floor.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill authorizes the President to use any agency or agencies that he may designate. The President is not limited——

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. My amendment covered that. I say, "such agency or agencies as he may designate and also the American Relief Commission."

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought the amendment only required an accounting from the American Relief Commission.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will yield the floor.

Mr. TEMPLE. I have no objection to the passage of that amendment.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment as a substitute to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], as follows: Strike out the period at the end of the printed bill and insert "such designated agency or agencies shall report to the Congress not later than June 30, 1922, giving an itemized statement showing the character and quality of products purchased, from whom purchased, and the price paid therefor, and also the amount paid for administration of said fund and the name of the persons to whom paid."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order upon the amendment that it is not germane to the amendment to which it is proposed as a substitute. Very briefly. The bill, of course, puts this fund absolutely under the control of the President. We know, of course, that the President will use some agency in carrying it out. Now, the amendment of the gentleman from Texas provides in accordance with the bill itself that the President shall report. The gentleman eliminates the President and requires that the agency or agencies shall report. It does not seem to me it is germane to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition, as the Chair understands it, is that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] suggests an amendment which will carry a report upon the transaction. Because a different method of making the report is suggested in the amendment to the amendment it does not occur to the Chair that that makes it not germane, and the point of order of the gentleman from Tennessee is overruled.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois by way of a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is customary when provision is made for an expenditure of Federal funds for independent activities and by organizations which have no official connection with the Government to require them to submit reports to the Congress. It is ordinarily the custom that those agencies and organizations make report to some executive branch of the Government, and we require the executive branch, or the executive head of some department or independent establishment of the Government, to submit a report to the Congress, and it would seem to me that inasmuch as this act authorizes the President to make these expenditures and conduct these activities through such agencies as he may designate, that when he selects the agency he should require them to report to him what has been done, and that he or some executive official should have the duty of reporting to the Congress. But we have no knowledge as to what society or organization there may be in Russia. It may be some native association over there, and we would hardly expect them to submit a report to the Congress. We ought to look to the Chief Executive or some of the heads of executive establishments for a report. I think it would be wiser if we followed that practice in this case, as we have done it in nearly every case that I can recall.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, may I have just a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I suppose there is no man living who does not sympathize with distress, and certainly nobody——

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, how is it that general debate is now in order? I have offered an amendment to the bill itself, and I make the point of order that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] and the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] will constitute, if adopted, an independent section to the bill, whereas my amendment is a change in the language of the bill itself, and therefore we should perfect a paragraph that is in the bill now before we add anything new to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota will be duly recognized.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I was about to say that nobody in the world sympathizes with distress more than I do, but I think if we will look about us, all over the land in which we live, we will discover a vast amount of distress that ought to be relieved. It is unfortunate that the conditions which are sought to be relieved by this bill exist, but they exist everywhere throughout the world.

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MADDEN. I have only a minute.

Mr. COCKRAN. Is there any such condition as this anywhere else in the world?

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I refuse to yield.

I do not believe it is within the constitutional province of the Congress of the United States to take the money of the American people and give it to any other people in the world. [Applause.] It is hard to come on the floor of the House and say that we are not willing to contribute to the well-being of people who are suffering in other nations. But part of the people are suffering at home, everywhere. It is easy for us by our votes to make a charge upon the backs of the American people by voting $20,000,000 one day and $50,000,000 another, to give to somebody else.

You charged the Appropriations Committee of the House, the members of which are your servants, with a program of economy. You said that economy should be the order of the day and that the taxpayers of America must be relieved to the extent that economy will relieve them. And while we are, as your servants, the members of the Appropriations Committee, sitting from 9 o'clock every morning until 9 o'clock at night trying to find ways to economize and reduce expenses and have these reductions in expense reflected in the tax rate that is now being levied upon the backs of the American people, you are coming into the House and spending millions where we are saving dollars. Do we hope by this method to be able to reduce the cost of government? I do not believe we can; and, for myself, I wish I could say what I know to be the facts. I would not dare say it, but I do know of conditions in America that would appall the Congress and the people if they dared to be told. Knowing them as I do——

Mr. COCKRAN. Why should we not know?

Mr. MADDEN (continuing). From confidential information given to me I can not see my way to vote a dollar out of the Treasury of the United States to be paid for any purpose that does not mean a relief to the conditions of the people in the Nation which we are sworn to serve.

Ah, many good people in America, kind-hearted, sympathetic, will pass resolutions——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. They will pass resolutions appealing to our sympathies. It is easy for us to extend that sympathy if it does not cost us personally any money. I would be willing to contribute my share personally to a fund to relieve the people of Russia, but I am not willing to vote out of the pockets of the American people a single dollar under the conditions that I know exist in America for expenditure in any place else in the world. And I hope this bill will not be passed. [Applause.]

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Minnesota and he will proceed.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, it should be borne in mind that the people for whom this relief is intended are not to blame for their sad plight. The calamity that has overtaken the people of the Volga region is of such severity and magnitude as make a strong appeal to the sympathies of the people of the whole world. The American people have voluntarily contributed large sums for the relief of suffering people in distant parts of the world, and they are thankful that they have been able to do so. We are praying and striving for an era of peace and good will among the people of the world and this effort to relieve distress in Russia will be but an evidence of our faith in the future of civilization.

I am opposed to this bill in its present form because it does not appropriate the money out of the Treasury but out of the funds of the United States Grain Corporation, the net profits of that corporation for handling part of the wheat crop of the farmers in 1919. The Grain Corporation was simply a trustee for the wheat raisers to sell and handle that wheat and the profit arising from that operation is justly and equitably the property of the wheat raisers of the United States. And if you want to dispense charity to the people of Russia, at public expense, why not appropriate it out of the Treasury? Why not let all the people bear this burden?

Here is the situation: There are thousands of wheat growers in the Northwest who did not get back the seed they planted last year or the year before. Somebody has got to relieve them. Why should not the money derived from the net profits of the Grain Corporation, handling the wheat, primarily be devoted to that purpose and not be devoted to helping outside people? [Applause.] If you are going to be generous, why should you not be generous at the expense of all the people? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman be given five minutes more.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Minnesota may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. The government of Russia has spent millions for propaganda to overturn the Government of the United States. They are the enemies of our institutions. Here is a gentlemen representing the great State of New York; he is the only Socialist in this body and the only native of Russia, and therefore he ought to be considered as speaking for these people. [Applause.] In his speech on the rule to consider this bill, among other things, he said:

> Without the authority of Congress and without the consent and against the will of the American people our own Government conducted war upon the Russian people. The appropriation of $20,000,000 to aid the famine-stricken people of the Volga region will be a very poor atonement, indeed, for the sins we have committed and are committing against the Russian people.

In his view this relief is not something for which the people of Russia should be grateful; it is only an atonement for the sins we have committed against them, and a very poor atonement at that. If any reason can be urged against granting this relief, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] certainly has found it. The American people are not willing to acknowledge that they have wronged Russia or that they ought to give either an effective or a poor atonement for what they have done. [Applause.] I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] has rendered the people of his native land a very poor service, for if any significance is attached to his words, this bill would be overwhelmingly defeated. In claiming that the United States of America waged war on the people of Russia the gentleman must refer to the American Expeditionary Force to northern Russia, and, second, to the American Expeditionary Force to Siberia in the year 1918. It should be remembered that before either of these expeditionary forces were launched Russia had deserted her allies in the war and made a treaty with Germany at Brest-Litovsk.

On page 23 of the report of the Secretary of War for the year 1919 the following reference is made to this expedition:

> The mission of this expedition, according to instructions prepared by the United States ambassador to Russia, was as follows:
> "As the Government of the United States sees the present circumstances, military action is possible in Russia now only to render such protection and help as is possible to steady any efforts at self-government or self-defense in which the Russians themselves may be willing to accept assistance, whether from Vladivostok or from Murmansk and Archangel. The only present object for which American troops will be employed will be to guard military stores which may subsequently be needed by the Russian forces, and to render such aid as may be acceptable to Russians in the organization of their own self-defense. With such objects in view, the Government of the United States will cooperate with the Governments of France and Great Britain in the neighborhood of Murmansk and Archangel."
> The forces under Col. Stewart remained in north Russia from September, 1918, to June, 1919. During this time they occupied various positions along the Vologda Railroad and the Onega, Dvina, and Vaga Rivers, and engaged in many minor operations against enemy forces. The following is the list of casualties in this force:

Killed in action	109
Died of wounds	35
Died of disease	81
Died of accident and other causes	19
Total deaths	244
Wounded	305
Taken prisoner (all released)	4
Total casualties	553

After the armistice was signed it was impossible to remove this detachment owing to the climatic conditions which forbade the movement of large bodies of troops or large amounts of supplies. In April, 1919, Brig. Gen. W. P. Richardson arrived at Archangel and took command of all troops of the American Expeditionary Forces in north Russia. The One hundred and sixty-seventh Company, Transportation Corps, came at the same time, but was stopped at Murmansk in order to cooperate with the One hundred and sixty-eighth Company, Transportation Corps, which had arrived in March, 1919, and was then engaged in construction on the Murmansk Railroad. During the month of June, 1919, all the forces of the United States were withdrawn, except a small detachment of Engineers. In September the last personnel of the American forces in northern Russia were en route to the United States.

It will be noted that the object of the expedition was to help the Russian people and to guard military stores and render such aid as may be acceptable to Russians in the organization of their self-defense.

In regard to the Siberian Expeditionary Force, the report says:

During the summer of 1918 the Czechoslovak armies operating in Siberia were threatened with destruction by hostile forces, apparently organized by and often largely composed of enemy prisoners of war. It was of importance to the Government of the United States that these friendly Czechoslovak forces be rendered assistance and that the Russian people be aided in every way acceptable to themselves in any and all efforts to regain control of their own affairs and their own territory.

This force was to save the Czechoslovak armies from destruction by the forces organized and largely composed of enemy prisoners of war.

What justification has the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] to describe this action on the part of the American Government as a war upon the Russian people? What right has he to say that it was without any authority of Congress and without the consent and against the will of the American people? If he had said that during the war, he would have been amenable for seditious and treasonable conduct, and it is an insult to the whole Nation and a reflection upon the 596 brave boys, some from my State and some from the State of Michigan and other States, that fell, many of them, who fought and were wounded and died on the battle fields of Russia for the sake of the Russian people.

We had millions, if not billions, of war supplies which, if it had not been for the protection given them by our soldiers and the soldiers of the Allies, would have fallen into the hands of the enemy. This is the reward that we get from him for having our soldiers bleed and die on the battle field in the interest of the Russian people.

I am opposed to this bill for the reason that if you want to appropriate money, you should appropriate it out of the Treasury, and not out of the profits derived from handling the farmers' wheat. That belongs to them. We propose to resort to it whenever it is necessary to furnish seed to the farmers themselves. [Applause.] It should be established as a revolving fund to aid farmers who either by rust, flood, drought, hail, or other unavoidable cause lose their crops in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, in offering the substitute that I offered a few moments ago to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] I had only one thing in mind, and that is that I feel that this legislation is perhaps questionable, and it seems to me prudence requires that we ought to have a report to Congress. The criticism of the gentleman from Massachusetts of my amendment leads me to believe that perhaps it is not in just the proper form. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONDELL as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. CONNALLY of Texas:

"That the President shall, not later than December 31, 1922, submit to Congress an itemized and detailed report of the expenditures and activities made and conducted through the agencies selected by him under the authority of this act."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think that is in the usual form.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming is a little more particular and requires a little more exactness, I accept his amendment. I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I offer my amendment as an amendment to the bill, at the end.

The CHAIRMAN. As an original section?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I will accept that amendment. We can vote upon it without further delay.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONDELL: On page 1, after the word "act," strike out the period and insert a comma and the language "that the President shall, not later than December 31, 1922, submit to Congress an itemized and detailed report of the expenditures and activities made and conducted through the agencies selected by him under the authority of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCOTT of Michigan: Following the amendment just adopted, insert "Provided, That the commodities above enumerated and purchased shall be transported to their destination in vessels of the United States, either those privately owned or those owned by the United States Shipping Board."

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LITTLE: Page 1, line 6, after the word "Russia" insert "and Armenia."

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that amendment that it is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania makes the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill. Does the gentleman desire to be heard?

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman in charge of the bill reserve his point of order and give me an opportunity to present my amendment?

Mr. TEMPLE. I ask for a decision on the point of order.

There is a very long line of decisions supporting the point of order I have made. If the gentleman will refer to Rule XVI, section 7, in the last sentence of that section, he will read that—

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. TEMPLE. No; not until I finish my statement. On the next page of the manual, page 340, it is stated that—

In determining whether or not an amendment be germane, certain principles are established.

(a) One individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition even though the two belong to the same class. Thus, the following are not germane:

To a bill proposing the admission of one Territory into the Union, an amendment for admission of another Territory.

Citing Hinds' Precedents, section 5529:

To a bill for the relief of one individual, an amendment proposing similar relief for another.

Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, sections 5826–5829:

To a resolution providing a special order for one bill, an amendment to include another bill.

Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, sections 5824–5836:

To a provision for extermination of the cotton-boll weevil, an amendment including the gypsy moth.

Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, section 5832:

The fact that there is a relationship or similarity between the two does not make germane an amendment bringing in another subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The provision under which this objection is made is stated in the rule of the House as follows:

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

It is sometimes difficult for the Chairman to decide what is the subject under consideration. In this particular case the Chair hardly thinks there can be any question about that matter. The question is the relief of the people in Russia. The proposition is not a proposition for the relief of starving people generally. If Armenia could be inserted, so could China or any other country. Under the decisions of previous Chairmen there has been no difference with regard to this class of propositions. Clearly it comes under the rule of all this class of precedents that one individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition, even though the two belong to the same class. The Chair will not take the time to read them; they are set out in extenso in the Manual. There is no doubt whatever in the mind of the Chair that it falls within both the rule and the line of precedents, and the point of order is sustained.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas appeals from the decision of the Chair, and the question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "purchase," insert "in the United States and" and strike out the comma after the word "purchase."

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to say much in support of this amendment. It is apparent to everybody who has been in the House very long that it is a desirable amendment. It simply provides that the grain shall be purchased in the United States. I think we will all agree that it ought to be, and I have no doubt the authorities will do so, but it will do no harm and certainly do a good deal of good to express in the bill the idea of Congress that it ought to be done. By adopting this amendment there will be no question about it, and under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SCOTT] the grain will be shipped in American ships. No doubt it will do Russia good and incidentally do us a great deal of good. [Applause.]

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I rise in opposition to the amendment just offered and oppose its adoption for the same simple reason that I am opposed to the bill in its entirety. It is needless for me to say that the picture presented and the appeal that has been made in behalf of the starving men, women, and children of the valley of the Volga is such as touches the chords of sympathy in the bosom of every true American; but, sirs, while our hearts throb with compassion for them in this their hour of want and woe let us not forget that there is involved a constitutional question deserving the most careful consideration of this body, and one which when weighed in calmness and deliberation drives us irresistibly to the conclusion that duty requires, and fidelity demands, the denial of this relief in the manner proposed.

The Constitution of this glorious Republic, the bulwark of our civil and religious liberty, the foundation upon which we have builded the greatest nation known to civilization, forbids me as a Representative in the Halls of this sacred Chamber from imposing burdens of taxation upon American citizens except in such cases and in such manner as is expressly provided by the terms thereof. Adherence to the provisions of its mandates is regarded of such importance as that no man can enter upon the legislative duties of a Representative until he has first taken and subscribed to an oath to support and defend it against all enemies both foreign and domestic.

Mr. Chairman, when I came to this House as a Member I stood in the well of this Chamber and, with uncovered head and uplifted hand, declared in the presence of Almighty God and my fellow man that I would faithfully discharge the obligations of that oath to the best of my skill and ability, and that pledge, so help me God, I shall never—no, never—betray. [Applause.]

The agony and distress of this people may be in a large measure attributed to their own indolence, indifference, and socialistic tendencies, yet I should hesitate to say that this of itself is sufficient to withhold relief, but the thing that I do want to make myself emphatic and clear upon is that whatever relief the American people desire to extend them should be voluntary on their part. I challenge the right of any Member of this body to levy taxes upon the good people of my district to the amount, in the manner and for the purposes proposed, and claim for myself no such right under the Constitution.

The generosity of the American people is traditional, but it seems that some doubt their willingness at this time to part with $20,000,000 under the showing here made. In my candid judgment your doubts are well founded. "Be just before generous" prompts the American people to relieve the distress of the 4,000,000 brave, patriotic, heroic men and boys, who, under the flag of liberty, bared their breasts to save the civilization of the world, before turning our substance and wealth over to a people, who, of all the people of all the earth, are the most bitter and uncompromising enemies of our free institutions. Thousands, yea tens of thousands, of these brave defenders of Old Glory are slowly but surely dying for lack of gratitude and lack of attention on the part of a Government for the preservation of which they were willing to die. [Applause.]

Ah, but, Mr. Chairman, when these brave boys were carrying the Stars and Stripes in victory over the blood-soaked fields of Flanders; when they were offering themselves a sacrifice upon the altar of war that we might be free; when they were wading the mud and blood of foreign fields of carnage for our sake; when they were paying their last full measure of devotion to country and to flag, the bullet dodger, the grafter, and the profiteer with one acclaim pronounced him "King of hosts," deserving the richest rewards that a grateful nation could bestow, but when he returned to native land, broken in health and in spirit, unable to resume the ordinary vocation of his past life, in need, indeed, of encouragement and assistance, these same grafters and profiteers gazed once more upon their rich stores of gratfed wealth, and in avarice proclaimed the Nation too weak and poor to pay a paltry sum to the gallant heroes who saved us in the darkest hours of our national life. Oh, such ingrates may have had the right to graft in war contracts, and wax rich on the sweat and blood of our heroes' dependents, but, I say, with all the emphasis at my command, that God forbids graft on the heroes who went through hell for America. [Applause.]

Let us return now to the original proposition and discuss briefly the constitutional features of this measure. I have listened patiently to the arguments of the proponents of this bill in the vain hope that they might be able to present some ground upon which this appropriation might be justified. It was first intimated that such authority was derived from the general welfare clause of the Constitution. When driven from that contention they seek to justify on the ground that a former Congress, namely, the Sixth-sixth, appropriated from the Treasury of the United States, in 1919 and 1920, $100,000,000 of the people's money to save the starving hordes of Armenia. I refuse to stultify myself simply because some other Congress has sinned against the Constitution and laws of the United States.

There was never a time in the history of mankind when the commission of a sin became right in the sight of God simply because the transgressor committed the same sin twice. In other words, the commission of two wrongs never did nor never will make a right. We must, therefore, find our justification from some other source, and I prefer to take for my guidance the Constitution itself. The only power given Congress under the general-welfare clause is contained in the following language:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States * * *.

By these provisions it is plain to be seen that Congress has no power to levy taxes under this provision, except it be to pay "debts" or to provide for the "common defense" or "general welfare," not of the world but of the United States. No one pretends that we owe a debt to Russia, nor can any man truthfully say that this appropriation will promote our common defense or general welfare. Indeed, if it has any effect the one way or the other it is to weaken our defense in that we are placing at the disposal of the red armies of bolshevik Russia $20,000,000 worth of grain for food and seed purposes, with which they are enabled to continue to scatter the destructive seeds of socialism even in fair America.

Were it not for the constitutional limitations upon our power I should then have my very grave doubts as to the wisdom of the course which you are about to pursue. We can not overlook the fact that our national debt was increased from 1914 to 1920 by approximately $22,000,000,000, so that now we have a debt aggregating $24,000,000,000, which must be paid by ourselves and our posterity. We have multiplied thousands of ex-service men who are utterly unable to earn support for themselves and families. We are confronted with an economic condition due to the almost complete demoralization of the finance of the nations of Europe, which has resulted in the lowering of demands for American products to an extent that thousands of our factories were closed immediately after the war and millions of men were thrown out of employment. We have as a result of all this untold woe and want among our own people, which time alone and strict adherence to policies of economy can alleviate.

We have in this Congress made progress by cutting to the very bone the expenses of government, so that in the next fiscal year we will be able to save to the taxpayers of America more than $2,000,000,000, but while we have made such a magnificent record in the first nine months of this administration, let us not forget that our first duty is to our own people; that charity begins at home; and that he who fails to provide for his own household is worse than an infidel. I truly hope that you will join with me in defeating this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. LARSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have never been accused, so far as I am aware, of indulging in maudlin sentimentality. I have always tried to keep my emotions under control. It may be I am too stolid, but I am frank to say that this measure appeals to my sympathy. I am not ashamed that it makes such an appeal, for sympathy is that which differentiates the man from the mere animal. I can not hear the cry of agonizing distress that comes to my ears from the starving millions of men, women, and children of Russia without raising my voice in their behalf. [Applause.] My conscience is not supersensitive, but neither is it so callous as to permit me to sit here in silence while others are opposing this humanitarian measure.

I am loath to criticize any of my colleagues, but their opposition to the granting of this relief, which, as is generally conceded, will save from the horrible death of starvation—the most horrible of all deaths—millions of their fellow human beings, is beyond my understanding. As was said by Him in whose name this relief is asked, I say to them: "Father, forgive them; they know not what they do."

It is my sincere conviction that if they should be successful in their efforts to prevent this House from making the necessary appropriation to save these unfortunate people from starvation their action would place an everlasting stigma not only upon this House but upon the entire Nation.

I believe in national economy; I believe in bringing back our country to normalcy; I am opposed to squandering the people's money; but in their zeal for economy the opponents of this measure are going altogether too far. National wealth is good, but human life is sacred. I refuse to follow them. I prefer rather to follow our President and our Secretary of Commerce. Yes; and, I say with all reverence, I prefer to follow Christ.

I thank God that we have in the White House a man whose heart is big enough that it has room in it for sympathy for suffering human beings although they live without the bounds of this country—a man who believes that charity is a universal duty; that the place for charity, like the place of God, is everywhere.

In faith and hope the world will disagree,
But all mankind's concern is charity.

We were told that we entered the World War not only to defend our national existence, not only to make the world safe for democracy, but to save our Christian civilization. I believe those are the noble purposes that prompted us to spend our treasure and to shed our blood. But let me ask those of you who are opposing this relief measure for reasons of mere economy: Is a nation, the richest in all the world, whose granaries are bulging with grain, a nation in which corn is so plentiful that it is being used for fuel, really a civilized nation if it should refuse to give an infinitesimal portion of that food to prevent the starving of many millions of human beings?

That is not my conception of a civilized nation. A civilized nation, like a civilized man, will share its abundance with the hungry and the starving.

They say we are a Christian nation, that we are followers of Christ. Let me ask you, who are trying to kill this bill, by what token could the American Nation be called Christian if its Congress should refuse to save these unfortunate people from starvation?

Would that be Christianity? Is not charity the very livery of Christ?

Suppose you should succeed in defeating this measure and Christ should come on earth, see these millions of emaciated, hungry, starving people, with gaunt faces, whose children with the bloated "hunger bellies" are dying of starvation, and then come to this land of plenty, this wealthiest land in all the world, and see here our granaries filled with grain, see us burning corn for fuel, what, I ask you, would He say to us?

Would you like to have His scathing denunciation, the utterance of His righteous indignation printed in the RECORD, to go down in history for the contemplation of posterity?

Methinks I hear Him say: "You call yourselves Christians; you pretend to be My followers; you hypocrites, you worse than the heathen, you do not know what Christianity is, nor what the love of God means. How can you love God, the Father, and refuse to save His children—your brethren—from starvation?"

In my mind's eye I can see the distinguished opponents of this measure slinking away, one after another, from His divine presence, ashamed, mortified, and, I hope, also penitent and with contrite heart, because in their zeal for economy they shackled their hearts and permitted to emanate from their brilliant intellects arguments that brought defeat to this humanitarian and Christian relief measure.

The American people, while they want us to exercise economy in the expenditure of their public treasure, do not want us to be stingy, penurious, and miserly with it, for they are a generous, humane, Christian people. In this very hour they are urging us, their trustees, to respond to the agonizing cry of distress which is so great in its volume that we can hear it here in America, though it emanates from far-off Russia. [Applause.]

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there seems to be a misunderstanding, I think clearly a misunderstanding, in the mind of my distinguished friend [Mr. MADDEN] and in the mind also of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE]. They overlook the fact that this bill proposes that this money shall be taken from the funds of the United States Grain Corporation. The President of the United States is the only stockholder in that corporation, and this money is really, in effect, a part of the profits made by that corporation during the war.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment. The money has never been turned into the Treasury, and it does not represent all of the profits made by that corporation, of which the President is the sole stockholder. The bill proposes simply that about $20,000,000 of what are, in effect, profits, now in the possession of the Grain Corporation, shall be to this extent diverted and not go into the Treasury.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. One moment. The Government of England would not ask us to contribute money from this Grain Corporation's funds for the starving poor of England, because England has an organized Government capable of borrowing money. If she can not raise the money by taxation, she can borrow the money to relieve distress in that Kingdom; but in Russia these starving mothers and fathers and children, dying by the hundreds of thousands, have no Government anywhere that can raise a penny to relieve them. Unless the world does something for them, eleven or twelve million will before next spring have starved to death.

Now, let me state the exact question that is before us. The United States Grain Corporation bought grain from American farmers at good prices and sold it at a good profit; and shall we now take a portion of those profits, which have never been turned into the Treasury, which were not extracted from the pocketbooks of the American taxpayer at all, and divert them to this magnificently noble use? There is not, in my judgment, a man in the House who, knowing all of the facts, will object to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOODYKOONTZ: Page 1, after the section, add a further provision to be known as section 2, reading as follows:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, further authorized, through such agency or agencies as he may designate, to purchase and distribute to the distressed, needy, and starving people of the United States the necessary food, fuel, and medical supplies necessary to relieve such distressed, needy, and starving people in the United States.

"That the President be, and he is hereby, further authorized to expend out of the funds of the United States Grain Corporation a sum not exceeding $20,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section of this act."

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order against that that I did to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from West Virginia desire to be heard?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard briefly only. I regret that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] has seen fit to interpose this objection. I can say this, however, that while it may not come within the rules of the House, at least it has the merit of coming within the Constitution of the United States. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota: Page 1, line 5, after the word "grain," insert the word "flour."

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, a reading of the hearings before the committee reporting out this measure will convince anyone of the terrible situation in the Volga Valley of Russia. Not only thousands, but millions of people will starve to death before the winter is over if relief is not immediately extended. Time, therefore, is of the essence. It has been urged that this is not a matter for the concern of our Government but that it is a matter for private charity. There is not the time for the organizing of a private charity. By the time the necessary funds were collected the people to be benefited would in great measure have died. Let me quote from the President's message the other day:

A severe drought in the valley of the Volga has plunged 15,000,000 people into grievous famine. Our voluntary agencies are exerting themselves to the utmost to save the lives of children in this area, but it is now evident that unless relief is afforded the loss of life will extend into many millions. America can not be deaf to such a call as that.

I am, therefore, in thorough sympathy with this legislation. I do believe, however, that the bill should be amended in one particular; hence the amendment that I have offered.

The purpose of this bill is to relieve the famine-stricken people of Russia. If any benefit inures to the people of America it should be purely incidental. The primary purpose is to benefit these stricken people. The bill, however, is not so drawn. It will be observed that it provides only for the purchase of "corn, seed grain, and preserved milk." The President and his agencies by this bill are not authorized, no matter what situation confronts them, to purchase any other food or commodities. They are restricted to corn, seed grain, and preserved milk. Gentlemen, this is a mistake. There are 15,000,000 people to be cared for. Most of these people have not been used to eating corn. It is true that starving people who are now eating roots can eat corn and nothing but corn. It is true that at the present price of corn more food can be sent to Russia for a given sum if the shipments are restricted to corn. At least that is what the proponents of this measure claimed before the committee. Yet, regardless of what contingency may arise, why should they be denied aught but corn?

It must be borne in mind that corn may not remain at its present price. The purchase by the Government for this purpose of several million bushels of corn will certainly raise the price of corn. Furthermore, with at least portions of these people unused to corn, the way should be left open for the furnishing of wheat flour, at least. Yet, if the bill becomes a law as it is now written, no matter what the exigency, none of this money is available to purchase flour of any kind. This leads one to wonder whether this bill is primarily for the relief of Russia, and if it is not to a great extent for the relief of the owners and holders of large quantities of corn.

I want to read an extract from a letter from a man who has had great experience in European relief work, W. C. Edgar, editor of the Northwestern Miller at Minneapolis. He has been in Europe prominently identified with or in charge of at least three relief expeditions. He was in Russia on a similar mission 30 years ago, and has written me in reference to his experiences, in part, as follows:

In every relief movement of which I have any knowledge strong efforts have been made to ship corn or corn products instead of wheat products. In many instances sincere attempts have been made to use these products for this purpose, because our country has always had a large supply of corn and was anxious to introduce it abroad as a food product, but I do not know of a single case in which the attempt was successful.

As an instance in point, I recall that during the Russian famine of 1891–92, when I organized and directed a movement to have the millers of the country give a shipload of flour to the peasants, the State of Nebraska generously gave a trainload of corn for our cargo. We accepted the gift, had the corn ground into meal, and put it aboard our ship in New York, the steamer Missouri. Into the mouth of each sack we inserted a bill printed in the Russian language, in large type, giving instructions for the preparation of various forms of corn bread, etc. I went to Russia, met the relief ship at Libau, and personally superintended the unloading and distribution of its cargo, traveling through the famine district to investigate the situation.

Mr. Edgar then goes on to say that the Russian was unable to use the corn meal except by the mixing of flour with it.

Mr. Chairman, there is a quality of wheat flour known as second clear which can be purchased to-day at $28 per ton. This is but a trifle more than the price of corn unground at to-day's prices. It certainly seems to me that this Congress should not so restrict the terms of this bill as to preclude the President, or his agents, from buying such quantities of this low-grade wheat flour as in their judgment may be needed, or as in their judgment it may be found advisable if the price of corn should go up.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. In just a moment. It seems to me that we ought at least to confer the power upon this agency to buy wheat flour if in their judgment it is needed in any community there for mixture with corn flour or for other purpose, and we ought not to restrict this authorization as to compel only the purchase of wheat and the distribution of wheat. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McSWAIN. On the same argument, would the gentleman not think it would be proper, and I think it would be proper to send a little bacon along to sop the biscuit in also. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Bacon is hardly the staff of life and wheat flour is. It seems to me that this bill ought not to be restricted as it is. I hope that the amendment permitting the use of flour will prevail.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is there any difficulty in transporting flour overseas?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Export flour is put in jute bags of 140 pounds, and second clear wheat flour can be transported overseas without any difficulty whatever, whereas corn meal—in fact, you can not ship it except as corn and not as meal.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania in charge of the bill—I obtained the impression that in the hearing before the Committee on Foreign Affairs it was brought out that the intention was, acting under this bill as reported from the committee, to purchase 5,000,000 bushels of seed wheat and 350,000 tins of milk, and that the remainder of the $20,000,000 would be invested in corn—am I correct in that impression?

Mr. TEMPLE. From three to five million bushels of wheat, 500,000 cases of preserved milk, and what may be possible within the limit of transportation of corn.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, now, may I ask the gentleman, is the wheat that is to be purchased under that to be used as seed wheat or food wheat?

Mr. TEMPLE. Seed grain is the language of the bill—to distribute corn, seed grain, and preserved milk.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, may I ask the gentleman further? The President in his message said this:

Unreservedly I recommend the appropriation necessary to supply the American Relief Administration with 10,000,000 bushels of corn and a million bushels of seed grain.

Now, of course, I assume that the President had specific data upon which he made those specific recommendations.

Now, may I ask the gentleman what testimony there is before the committee to indicate that those recommendations were too low or that they should be increased?

Mr. TEMPLE. Two witnesses particularly who had been sent over to make investigation and return with reports were Gov. Goodrich, of Indiana, and Dr. Kellogg, who went for the relief administration, but neither of whom is now connected with it. Mr. Goodrich has not been connected with it at any time. The conditions they found and described to the committee and the estimates they made of the amounts necessary were sufficient to convince the committee that the amount at first contemplated was insufficient.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, were those gentlemen able to state that they investigated as to the amount of seed grain that would be required?

Mr. TEMPLE. How careful, how minute the investigation was I do not know, but in commune after commune which they visited, after having first learned all it was possible from the general statistics gathered, not only from the central soviet government in Moscow but also from the heads of the so-called independent republics which are federated together and comprise the general soviet government—after securing all these records and statistics they made an investigation of their own in various communes sufficient to convince them that the general statistics were reasonably accurate so far as they could determine. In one commune there were 11 of the grain houses where the people of the commune stored their food for the winter. Nine of them were empty. In another there were eight of the communal grain houses; seven of them were empty and the other not full. Those people are not going to have enough to eat. They will be dead before planting time. It is one of the purposes of this bill to send them enough to keep them alive and send them grain to plant.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Now, let me ask the gentleman, Did the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, have any information about the amount of seed grain required?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The Secretary of Commerce, of course, has been food administrator of the world, but did he have any knowledge about the amount of seed grain required? If so, what did he say about it?

Mr. TEMPLE. There will possibly be as the result of the efforts of the soviet government sufficient seed furnished for one-fifth——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I think we are reaching a discussion of the merits of this bill now, and I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TEMPLE. If they received the seed which the soviet authorities expect to send them they would have from that source about one-fifth of their normal planting. It is proposed that the American Relief Administration furnish another one-fifth. It will require from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 bushels from the Relief Administration, the quantity varying according to the area they attempt to supply, to give the Russian farmer in those areas two-fifths of his normal planting.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the gentleman able to tell us what machinery will be built up to insure that this will be seed grain?

Mr. TEMPLE. The machinery is over there, already organized by the American Relief Administration and the Friends Relief—the Quakers.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let me say this: One remark the gentleman made surprised me somewhat, to the effect that the soviet government might have something to do with this.

Mr. TEMPLE. Not with this.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. In what connection in relation to the administration?

Mr. TEMPLE. The soviet government is attempting to afford some relief through its own machinery. The American Relief Administration will not use that machinery at all, because they want the work to be, frankly, under control that they can trust.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. If the gentleman will yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. With the exception, however, that the soviet government transports this food.

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes; it is furnishing transportation and furnishing guards, so that after a shipment reaches Russia there will be no charge for transportation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have this feeling about it—and I want to express it frankly—I had the idea that the President, when he made his recommendation as to amount, and being specific in amount, had information from sources that are available to the executive department, and that those recommendations ought to be relied on. Now, I confess, frankly, I was very much astounded when I saw what was an actual change as to amount. The President's recommendation was very specific—a million bushels of seed grain; I presume he meant wheat—and 10,000,000 bushels of corn. Now, that has been changed under the terms of this bill, or under the intendment of this bill, to where they purchase, I believe the gentleman from Pennsylvania stated, from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 bushels of wheat or seed grain, and so many cases of milk, and then the rest of it to be put in corn. What I am wondering about is whether we really have all the information that we ought to have about it.

Mr. TEMPLE. As I said, the testimony of Gov. Goodrich and Mr. Kellogg and Secretary Hoover——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Gov. Goodrich and Mr. Kellogg, although they are honorable gentlemen, were simply visitors there and were not there in any official capacity.

Mr. TEMPLE. If the gentleman will allow me, they were sent there for the specific purpose of making that investigation and bringing back a report.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Sent by whom?

Mr. TEMPLE. By the American Relief Administration. None of the men engaged in the work there was going to come back, inasmuch as they were too busy doing the work. It was thought advisable by the American Relief Administration to send somebody over there, not engaged in that work, to make the investigation, and these were the two men—Gov. Goodrich and Dr. Kellogg.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I assume the President received the information upon which he predicated his recommendation to Congress from the State Department. Was any information from that department laid before the committee?

Mr. TEMPLE. Nothing direct; but my information is that the President has expressed himself as quite well pleased with the proposed appropriation of $20,000,000.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, we are all delighted that the President is pleased; but, after all, that is not conclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in two minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. BARKLEY. To offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. TEMPLE. I was asking unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the debate close in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. TEMPLE. That the debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we are endeavoring to carry out the recommendations of the President, very specific in character, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has just suggested. The committee deemed it wise to practically double the amount or volume of the relief, but except for a slight departure from the original program in the matter of condensed milk adhered or intended to adhere to the plan proposed by the President as to seed grain and corn. None of those who appeared before the committee in behalf of this measure has asked for other classes or varieties of foodstuffs, and it would be in my opinion a very great mistake to depart from the original purpose of the measure as proposed by the President and as urged by the 10 men who appeared before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on line 5, to strike out the word "seed."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BARKLEY moves to amend page 1, line 5, by striking out the word "seed."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the reason why I offer this amendment. Under the language of the bill the President is authorized to use this money for the purpose of purchasing corn as food. He is only authorized to purchase grain for seed purposes. I understand that these people need food now, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] confirmed my understanding a moment ago by suggesting that they are starving now, and if they are compelled to wait until seed time and the crop is harvested in order to obtain wheat bread they will continue to starve.

Now, the striking out of the word "seed" does not deprive the President of authority to give them seed grain, but it also authorizes him to have purchased under his direction wheat for food purposes if he thinks it necessary to furnish wheat for food purposes. It strikes me that the word "seed" should not be there because under the terms of the act he could not buy a bushel of wheat for the purpose of making bread. He will be absolutely limited to the purchase of seed wheat.

I do not know whether the people over there are in the habit of using corn for bread or not, but during the war it was stated that it was not used for food in Europe. Certainly we ought not to limit the President under his authority to have purchased wheat for food if they need wheat for food. I think as long as you spend the $20,000,000 the President ought to be given discretion to purchase anything that might be needed to prevent starvation. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to leave the appropriation in his hands to use as he sees fit for the purchase of any kind of food he deems wise to prevent the starvation of those people. If we are to limit it to the purchase of corn and milk as food and only allow him to purchase wheat for seed, I think we shall fail in giving the full measure of relief we contemplate in the passage of this bill.

I hope the gentleman will accept this amendment.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, the fact is that the people of that afflicted district are using the corn that the American expedition has taken over there. They know how to grind it in their local communal mills, and they know how to prepare it for food; those who are using it are flourishing on it. The purpose is to purchase food, the greatest amount of food that can be purchased for a dollar, and more corn can be purchased for a dollar than wheat. We can save more lives with corn with a given expenditure of money. The seed grain is not limited to wheat.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the gentleman will yield, there is no question about that, but ought the commission or the President to be limited in their authority to purchase wheat if they find it necessary?

Mr. TEMPLE. If we do not furnish seed grain, and do not furnish enough to keep the adults alive during the winter to plant that grain next spring, we might as well do nothing.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am in favor of furnishing the seed grain, I will say to the gentleman, but I think in addition to furnishing it for seed, if it is necessary, we should also furnish it for food.

Mr. TEMPLE. It is not necessary to furnish wheat for food if we can send them enough corn.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close in two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to me that there can be any question in the mind of anyone who has given any thought to the import of the pending amendment as to what should be done with it. It ought to be rejected. The money appropriated for those people ought to be used so as to render the largest possible service and furnish the largest possible amount of food. This can be done by buying American corn, which will go further in sustaining human life for the amount invested than any other grain. Seed grain is necessary in order to obtain a harvest next summer, and the word "seed" should remain in the bill and its use confined to the purpose indicated by the measure.

No one can read the pitiful accounts of the starving men, women, and children of the Volga region without going out in sympathy for this most unfortunate people. Had Russia had a decent government her credit would have been ample to have procured the necessary supplies, but that Government has been one of robbery, devastation, and death. It is a black chapter that has been written by Lenine and Trotski, but let us hope that out of the ashes will arise at last a new government, both stable and just, a government created by the people and responsive to their collective will.

But our concern to-day is not primarily with Russia's form or character of government. There are approximately 20,000,000 people in the Volga region that are in dire need. Men and women are dying by the thousands and children by the tens of thousands for lack of food. Famine is stalking through the land. The Society of Friends (Quakers) are feeding 25,000 and the American Relief Administration will feed 1,250,000 children, but there are millions more who are starving, tens of thousands of whom will perish from hunger unless relief is speedily granted. Private charity is no longer able to cope with the situation. Europe for the most part is bankrupt in resources and apparently unable or unwilling to help. If these people are to be saved, the American Government must step in. Out of our abundance and plenty it is meet that we should aid those in distress, and, above all, that we should bring relief to the unhappy and suffering children of Russia who are dying for want of food.

Throughout the Volga Valley, which for many years has been known as the granary of Europe, there was very little rain during the growing period last summer. The people living there both sowed and planted in ample areas and cared for the crops in their usual husbandlike manner, but there was no harvest. Shall we, because tyrants have gotten possession of their Government and helped spread devastation and death throughout the land, refuse such reasonable aid as our resources will permit? From $10,000,000 to $20,000,000 in addition to what private charity will continue to supply will tide these people over till next harvest and also supply the necessary seed grain to enable them to provide against another famine.

We have large quantities of corn and other grains and can feed these people out of our surplus. Arrangements should be made by our Government to purchase these supplies as directly as possible from the producers. Millers and middlemen are busy trying to get Congress to modify this relief bill in such a way as to enable them to dispose of their supplies of flour and other foods. We have no concern with these men in this bill, nor should our gifts be subject to the graft of the profiteers. The money appropriated should be expended in such a manner as to bring the greatest possible quantity of wholesome food supplies to the relief of these stricken people. Corn and milk will fulfill this requirement and can be furnished out of our surplus without raising the cost of living at home. In buying this surplus direct from the American farmer at a reasonable price and sending it to the starving Russians, we shall not only be the means of saving hundreds of thousands of the unfortunate and starving, but shall do much to relieve the hardships of our own farmers, who in many parts of our country have been compelled to burn their corn for lack of a market. [Applause.]

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEENERSON offers the following amendment: Strike out of lines 9 and 10, on page 1, the following words: "Out of the funds of the United States Grain Corporation."

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, you heard the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] explain that this money that is proposed to be appropriated for the relief of the starving Russians is the result of the profits of the United States Grain Corporation in the handling of the wheat crop of the farmers of the United States.

When the United States Grain Corporation was created it was created for the purpose of aiding the farmers in disposing of this wheat crop, and as a result of that there is a net profit, some say of $25,000,000, some say of $20,000,000, some say of $19,000,000, that is now in its treasury. That, being the result of the operations of this instrumentality of the Government, is in the nature of a trust fund which belongs to the men who furnished the wheat which was handled by that Grain Corporation.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Not yet. In a moment I will. Equitably and in good conscience this money belongs to the farmers who furnished that wheat, and it is unconscionable to take that profit and say, "Here, this does not cost the people of the United States anything; it is a profit made out of the farmers." It is unconscionable to take that and give it away and say to the hundred million people of the United States this generosity costs you nothing; we will take it out of the farmers' fund.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; not yet. I say that fund ought to remain where it is, to relieve those farmers who have raised wheat in the two years since 1919, when that profit was made. There are thousands of them who lost the seed that they put in for two years. There are thousands of them who will have to leave their homes. Congress should take that money, made at the expense of the farmers' wheat, and use it for their relief. If you want to be generous, do not take it out of that fund, but take it out of the taxpayers at large. Take it out of the United States Treasury.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I decline to yield. I know what the gentleman is after.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. No; the gentleman does not know what I am after. I want a little information, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman has a way of insisting on being recognized, but, with all due respect, I am going to show him that I am not going to yield. [Laughter.]

It is unconscionable to take this $20,000,000 of the money that belongs to the wheat raisers of the United States and give it away because you want to be charitable. Why do you not take it out of your own pockets? [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. STEENERSON. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the amendment prevails and it comes to the disposition of the assets of the Grain Corporation among the farmers who grew the wheat, has the gentleman a plan worked out for that distribution?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I think we could keep that as a revolving fund to loan to those in North and South Dakota, Montana, Minnesota, and other States, who will either have to get their seed wheat from the Government this spring or have to let their farms stay idle. It is absolutely necessary, and it is a proper fund with which to aid our own farmers.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the bill and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that all debate on the bill and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Reserving the right to object, I have an amendment that I would like to present.

Mr. TEMPLE. This will not prevent the gentleman from presenting his amendment.

Mr. FESS. If I can get in. Somebody else may get in.

Mr. TEMPLE. I have not control of the time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from Minnesota desire more time?

Mr. STEENERSON. I should like to have time to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD if I can be recognized by the gentleman from Kentucky and also by the Chairman.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, have I the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] for unanimous consent that debate on the bill and amendments thereto close in 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I object on account of gentlemen on this side having amendments to offer.

Mr. TEMPLE. I move that all debate on this bill and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that all debate on this bill and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCSWAIN) there were—ayes 93, noes 20.

Accordingly the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON]. If I were opposed to this bill upon the ground offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, I think I should vote for the bill. [Laughter.] The gentleman speaks of $20,000,000 being now in the Treasury as a trust fund for the farmers of the United States or the wheat growers. Well, as a matter of fact, this money, as I understand it, is not yet in the Treasury. It is in the possession of the United States Grain Corporation, which is a private corporation organized under the laws of the State of Delaware, I think, in which corporation the President of the United States in his official capacity is the sole stockholder.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] would have this money held for the relief of the wheat growers and farmers of North Dakota, as one State he mentions. Of course, we all realize that after the régime which was sought to become established in that great Commonwealth there are a few farmers up there who need a little assistance. Undoubtedly, in view of the unfortunate experiments which they undertook, similar in some respects to that sought to be put into effect in this unhappy country and whom we are attempting to relieve by this bill, a large slice of the $20,000,000 would come in handy at this particular season of the year. [Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I disagree with the gentleman from Minnesota. That money was intended to be turned back into the Treasury of the United States. It was not made from the poor farmers who sold their crops; it was made from the people who bought them. It was sold to all sorts of people everywhere. It was sent abroad not only to countries involved in the war but to other countries not involved in the war which were unable to get normal supplies from their own sources.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. This bill is not limited to the profits in the hands of the grain corporation. As I understand, the profits have been loaned out, and this is designed to be taken from the capital stock.

Mr. WALSH. I think the gentleman is in error. The funds in the hands of the grain corporation at the present time are the profits that that corporation has made on its various transactions. I may be in error.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman is in error about that.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Minnesota and the farmers of North Dakota would have an interesting time sitting down and trying to evolve a scheme for the distribution of this fund to the various farmers. You talk about the triple transportation system in Russia—if we had a distribution of this fund in Washington the rush of the farmers from those States to come in and get a part of that fund would soon cripple the transportation system of the United States. [Laughter.]

While we all appreciate the great help the American farmer is to our system—I am sure everyone realizes the kindly feeling I have toward him and his representatives here on the floor—I submit that, opposed to this measure as I am, I would prefer to see this fund, if they must divert it, taken out of the Treasury and put on its way to relieve these starving people rather than to hold out the hope to some farmer out yonder of the Nonpartisan League that if he would only quit work and let his farm go to seed that down yonder in Washington there is a profit made on sales of grain during the war and if he writes the right kind of a letter to the right kind of Representative he can share in it. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on this amendment, and the question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

By unanimous consent, Mr. STEENERSON was given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I understood that the committee closed debate in 20 minutes on the bill and not on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It closed it on the whole bill.

Mr. WINGO. But the 20 minutes had not expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman he thinks the Chair ought to recognize.

Mr. WINGO. But I was asking for recognition, and the Chair ruled that debate had been closed when it had not.

The CHAIRMAN. There had been one speech for and one speech against.

Mr. WINGO. But I had a perfect right to offer a pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Arkansas for that purpose and did recognize the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FESS: Page 1, line 6, after the word "people," strike out the words "of Russia" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in that portion of Russia known as the Volga Valley."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I will not take the five minutes to discuss my amendment to limit this donation to the people within the famine-stricken district. I want to call attention to the fact that these charges that have been made by Members of the House that we are undertaking to salvage the suffering people in Europe without regard to the cause of suffering or the character of the people will largely lie if we leave this language as broad as it is, because it now extends to all portions of Russia, wherever suffering may exist, from whatever cause. In that case I think we ought to salvage the Armenian people and other populations outside as well as inside of Russia. We ought certainly to listen with considerable deference to the suggestion of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GOODYKOONTZ] to take care of our own people. This should be done before we undertake to succor all the world. We establish a very serious precedent when we open the door so wide that there is no limit as to whom or what the people are, or the cause of their condition, that we are going to help in this way. If we limit this to the suffering people of the Volga Valley, as provided in my amendment, and which was the purpose originally of those who asked it, then we have a precedent for our legislation and some justification for it. We then limit it to the suffering of the people under circumstances over which no one had control and no one could be responsible for, namely, famine, through failure of crops, which under the law we call the act of God. Such a situation invites our generous treatment and is justification for governmental action. In that case there is no charge that is justifiable that we are undertaking to salvage all Europe, no matter what it costs, by voting the people's money without their consent and in the face of much suffering here at home.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Upon what authority does the gentleman state that the purpose of those asking for it was that it should be confined to the territory embraced in his amendment?

Mr. FESS. I base that upon the suggestion of those who appeared before the committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But that is not in the President's message, that is not in the statement made by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. FESS. But will the gentleman permit me to answer his question? That is on the suggestion, as I was about to say, of the Secretary of Commerce, who presented the situation originally to the President and who has been identified with relief work in Europe for several years. It is with that in view that I should like to have the membership of the House understand the significance of the amendment, limiting this fund to the relief of the people who are suffering because of famine. Unless it is so limited I shall be compelled to vote against the measure and leave the relief to private contributions.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. ROGERS. I want to read a sentence from the President's message:

> A severe drought in the valley of the Volga has plunged 15,000,000 people in grievous famine.

Mr. FESS. In other words, the President suggested the cause for which he asked relief, and confined it to the people to whom I wish here to confine it.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Does not the gentleman consider with the present limitation of the bill that it is sufficient, being limited to the starving people of Russia, when the authority is conferred upon the President of the United States?

Mr. FESS. No. There are people who are suffering and perhaps starving in sections of Russia, not because of famine but rather a wicked and marauding band of political bandits now in charge of that unhappy country. These people are starving not because of a famine no one could avoid, but because of the interruptions and dislocations arising out of a bolshevik régime of government which could have been avoided, and the fruits of which must not be overlooked by the Russian people.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Can they not safely leave that to the President of the United States?

Mr. FESS. I think we ought to close this door because if you keep it open no human being can tell where it will ultimately lead. I can not willingly open such a door. That sort of aid must be left to donations where I give my own money and not vote the peoples' money without their consent.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. If we leave this bill as it is, so as to include all Russia, will we not be putting ourselves under the imputation in the minds of the American people that we are aiding the soviet government as well?

Mr. FESS. I think so.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Massachusetts read a portion of the President's message, to the effect that a drought in the valley of the Volga had brought starvation to many people. Of course it would, but the message surely does not mean that the relief shall be extended only where the drought occurred. A drought in the valley of the Mississippi would bring starvation to unnumbered millions of people in this country.

Mr. FESS. I insist that the President and the Secretary of Commerce had in mind the starving people in the famine district, which is confined to the Volga region. Here the cause of suffering could not have been avoided, but there are sections where suffering might have been avoided.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. My friend from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] has been insisting all of the time that we should extend this to all the suffering people, and he has made a very strong argument. Ever since the war he has been one of the constant leaders for American governmental aid for certain European people who have his sympathy. If you are going to that extent, it must not be governmental. If so we are subject to the charge that we are salvaging Europe and not paying attention to our own suffering at home, and I do not propose to stand for that. While my sympathies are as deep as others for the suffering people of the Old World we must be both cautious with our power over the peoples' funds and generous to our own sufferers within our midst. If the funds are limited to the famine-stricken country I will vote for it. Otherwise I regret to be compelled to vote against it.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I find myself somewhat confused by the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. As I grasped the suggestion of the President of the United States, he placed his recommendation for relief upon the broad ground that the people of the United States would respond to the call of distress everywhere, and I noticed a good many gentlemen applauded that. I am unable to see why there would be a peculiar call upon the American people to go to the relief of the starving children in the valley of one river that would not be equally potent to go to the relief of the starving children in the valley of another river or on some mountain top.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I can not now. It but confirms the suspicion that I have, that underneath this bill possibly there is a question of international diplomacy, that you are trying to do things in an indirect way, diplomatically, in Europe. You are trying to do something with a gang of freebooters who have looted a fair country and have overridden a good, honest, simple people. I know something about the amount of gold that is coming from Russia. If I were President of the United States and had control of the customhouse at New York, I believe I could find some way to tell that gang of freebooters that is in charge in Russia that before they can bring in at one time $45,000,000 of gold which they have stolen and distribute it for propaganda purposes in the United States, they must at least take $20,000,000 of it to feed the starving children of their own country. [Applause.]

I am opposed to buying political peace with the bolshevist government. But that is not what you are going to do. If it is a call of distress to which you are going to respond, then the children in the valley of the other regions of Russia are God's children just the same as those in the valley of the Volga. And why should not this Government go to the relief of distress in another part of Europe if we go to relief of distress in the valley of the Volga River? What is the peculiar significance? Why do you want to limit it? You say that they have had a drought. Gentlemen, drought or no drought, the starving of children is not confined to the valley of the Volga in Russia. Distress is not the result simply of the drought over there. Why, gentlemen, you can go anywhere among the peasantry of Russia, with the exception possibly of one commune, and you will find starvation. Why? Because the processes of civilization have broken and fallen down. There is no stable economic structure. Loot and graft and pillage rule the land and the humble peasantry of Russia have their fields devastated; what grain they get is looted and taken from them, and they face starvation for their children from the lack of seed grain for their next year's crop. That is the only theory upon which you can seek to justify taking the people's money, and if you put it upon that ground, why limit it to the starving children of one valley of Russia and not go to the relief of the starving children of the rest of Russia. [Applause.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the gentleman able to give informatiton as to how many people of the entire areas depend upon grain in the Volga Valley for support?

Mr. WINGO. I do not know, but it is very considerable, the number outside being greater.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. CHANDLER of New York to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]: "The term 'Russia' as herein used shall be understood as being the limits of the Russian Empire existing at the outbreak of the World War."

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss——

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that is not a substitute. [Cries of "Vote!"] If it is a substitute, it has to go where the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio goes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly thinks——

Mr. FESS. I make a point of order upon the amendment—will the Chair hear me—upon the basis that my amendment has limited the application of this fund to people of a district in Russia. I do not pretend to define the word "Russia." The gentleman from New York offers an amendment defining the word "Russia" that appears in the bill. That has no significance to what my amendment is.

The CHAIRMAN. The fact is, however, both have reference practically to defining the word "Russia" as it is in this bill, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I agree heartily with my friend from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] that charity should have no geographic lines. Human suffering should be the only limit to its application.

In the few minutes allowed me in the matter of the substitute I have offered I wish to say that the amendment of my friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS] restricting the charity provided by this bill to the Volga Valley in Russia would be unjust, and, in a sense, barbarous and cruel. I am opposed to injecting bolshevism and the thought of punishing it into a work of national and international charity such as we contemplate by the passage of this measure. I believe that the blessings of charity, like the blessings of God, should fall upon all who deserve it, and should be dispensed everywhere in Russia without reference to bolshevik or nonbolshevik areas.

But if political subdivisions are to be observed, and if discriminations are to be made in the matter of the sufferers from starvation in the ancient lands of the Czars, those peoples of Russia that stood by our country and her allies in the great struggle to destroy militarism and to preserve liberty and civilization on the earth should not be forgotten. The people of the valley of the Volga are supposedly adherents of Lenin and Trotski, and their children should certainly not receive special treatment in the great work of charity over the children of the peoples of Esthonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Georgia, and Azerbaidjan, the brave little non-Russian Republics of the former empire of the Czar that fought with us first against the Germans and for the last three years have been bravely fighting bolshevism and the red armies of Russia, gun in hand, at the frontiers of their homelands.

Now, I did not intend to offer this substitute until my good friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS] attempted by his proposed amendment to limit the area of charity. In my judgment, the question of the areas of distress should be left to the discretion of the President and to the administrators of the money to be voted, as to what "Russia" means, and to give charity in those regions where the suffering is greatest.

I myself can personally testify that in the Baltic States and in the countries of the Caucasus, distant from the valley of the Volga, the suffering is appalling. Besides, Mr. Vickery, of the Near East Relief, who has just returned from Constantinople and from Tiflis in Georgia, recently said to me that the suffering of the Caucasus was heartrending, and that the need of charity was imperative.

Mr. WALSH. Will not the gentleman's amendment make those funds available over so large a territory and such an increased population that the average relief will be small?

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I will say to the gentleman that both the Baltic and Caucasian States are more accessible, as far as transportation is concerned, than are the regions of the Volga, and as to the distribution of the fund it should be given to all alike where the suffering is equal.

But in any case, it would be ironically cruel to pass through Reval and Riga on the Baltic coast and through Batoun and Baku, ports of the Caucasus, carrying food past the doors of starving men, women, and children of the countries that have been our friends in the greatest crisis of the history of mankind, to be delivered to the inhabitants of the Volga in the very heart of the country of bolshevism, the great political scourge and curse of mankind.

If the area of charity be limited by the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], after the defeat of the substitute that I am offering, to the Volga Valley, what will the starving people of certain afflicted areas in the Baltic States and in the lands of the Caucasus say of the heartless ingratitude of those for whom they fought and sacrificed and died? I ask the committee to support the substitute that I have offered, and thereby defeat the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], to the end that the President and the administrators of the charity fund provided by this bill may dispense the money that we are giving to the greatest sufferers and the neediest among the starving people of all Russia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the reporting of the substitute.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, the substitute, of course, will take the place of the amendment. How will the text read with the substitute incorporated?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks for the reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FESS: Page 1, line 6, before the word "people," strike out the words "of Russia" and insert "in that portion of Russia known as the Volga Valley."

Substitute offered by Mr. CHANDLER of New York for the amendment offered by Mr. FESS: The term "Russia," as herein used, shall be understood as being the limits of the Russian Empire existing at the outbreak of the World War.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the substitute is adopted, where will it appear in the text?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment was offered, as the Chair understood, by the gentleman from Ohio as a substitute to the text.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. I offered to amend his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I will suggest to the gentleman from New York that would not make good sense, as that follows the word "Russia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER].

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: In line 10, strike out the figures "20,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "10,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 78.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9548 and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Pending that, may I ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question? Will there be any further business attempted this afternoon?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I think not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There will be none? We will adjourn after we finally dispose of this bill?

Mr. MONDELL. That is my expectation.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There being no demand, the amendments were agreed to en gross.

The question then being on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 140, noes 51.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, and I challenge the vote just had for that reason.

The SPEAKER. Clearly there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 181, nays 71, answered "present" 4, not voting 175, as follows:

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 19, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, Thou hast been very gracious in Thy dealings. Thou hast helped us in critical situations and enabled us to understand the high principles of duty as interpreted for us by Thy providence and Thy word. We seek Thine aid to-day, looking only for the highest welfare of the Nation and of the world at large. Ever be our guide, ever lead us onward to greater heights of responsibility and the performance of duty. We ask in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

RALPH H. CAMERON, a Senator from the State of Arizona, and JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, appeared in their seats to-day.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 9548. An act for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia; and

H. J. Res. 234. Joint resolution authorizing the payment of salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1921, and making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CURTIS. These are measures of importance, and I ask that they be laid before the Senate and referred at once.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution were each read twice by title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

H. R. 9548. An act for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia; and

H. J. Res. 234. Joint resolution authorizing the payment of salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1921, and making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

REINTERMENT OF SOLDIER DEAD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Acting Quartermaster General of the Army, which the Secretary will read:

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL OF THE ARMY,
Washington, December 15, 1921.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The inclosed copy of lists of American soldier dead returned from overseas, consisting of 2 officers and 63 enlisted men to be reinterred in the Arlington National Cemetery, Thursday, December 22, 1921, at 2.30 p. m., are furnished for consultation by Members of the Senate. It is requested that they be posted or displayed in a suitable place for the purpose desired.

Very truly, yours,

C. R. KRAUTHOFF,
Brigadier General, Quartermaster Corps,
Acting Quartermaster General.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will lie on the desk for the information of Senators.

REPORT OF FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, chairman of the Federal Power Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, the first annual report of the Federal Power Commission, and inviting attention to pages 193 to 223, inclusive, thereof, the text of which incorporates data with respect to permits and licenses issued under the Federal water power act, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CANDIDATES FOR THE NOBEL PEACE PRIZE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Undersecretary of State, transmitting, for the information of the Senate, a circular issued by the Nobel peace prize committee of the Norwegian Parliament respecting the proposal of candidates for the Nobel peace prize, to be distributed December 10, 1922, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ACTUARIES REPORT ON CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT LAW.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, together with the report of the Board of Actuaries, relative to the operation of the act for the retirement of employees in the classified service, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

FEDERAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES OF CHRIST.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, transmitting a statement containing declaration, ideals, policy, and program adopted by the executive committee of said council at their meeting in Chicago, Ill., December 14–16, 1921, containing sundry recommendations dealing with questions of international relationships and commending the Conference on Limitation of Armament as a step looking toward a warless world, but especially favoring the establishment of the institutions of peace and a peace system through international Christian cooperation, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PRODUCTION OF COTTON.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have received letters from different parts of the country protesting against what seems to be an injustice to those who have been interested in the acreage and production of cotton in the South.

In October, I believe, and in November there was a report from the Bureau of Crop Estimates, in the Department of Agriculture, that the cotton acreage had been reduced about 28 per cent as compared with the acreage of 1920, the previous year, and the report was that the condition was perhaps the lowest in the history of cotton production. They therefore estimated upon that basis that the yield of cotton for 1921 in the United States would be approximately 6,500,000 bales.

This is a matter of such tremendous importance to the trade of America, as well as to the different industries of America, that these things must be done in accordance with every rule that would tend toward accuracy.

On December 1 they revised their estimate and said there would be 8,340,000 bales. This was so startling to the trade that it demoralized the market temporarily.

Now, those who are not familiar with this should understand that the law requires that the Bureau of the Census shall obtain from ginners every two weeks through gin reporters the number of bales ginned and report the same to the Census Bureau, and that they shall give the actual number of bales ginned regardless of their weight.

On November 1 of the present year the Census Bureau reported that there had been ginned this year 6,646,000 bales against a ginning of even date, 1920, November 1, of 7,508,000 bales, a difference of 862,000 bales between the two ginnings, 1920 and 1921, there being 862,000 bales more ginned in 1920 than in 1921.

Now, mark you: On November 14 they reported 7,270,000 bales ginned against 8,914,000 bales in 1920, a difference of 1,644,000 bales between the two seasons. Just two weeks later, on December 1, 1921, they reported 7,640,000 bales ginned, against 10,141,000 for last year, a difference of 2,500,000 bales.

Therefore, to state it so the Senate may grasp the significance of it, we were only 600,000 bales, in round numbers, behind last year's ginning on November 1. We were more than 1,000,000 bales behind on November 14, and more than 2,000,000 bales behind on December 1. The estimate by those who had kept up with the conditions was that there were still to be ginned something less perhaps than 2 per cent. The Bureau of Crop Estimates had estimated only 6,500,000. The actual bales ginned up to December 1, according to the actual count, was 7,640,000, something over a million bales difference between what the estimating board of the Bureau of Crop Estimates was predicting in October and the actual number of bales ginned. Therefore, when they gave their final estimate on December 1, they made it 8,340,000 bales, in round numbers something like 2,000,000 bales discrepancy between the October estimate and the December estimate.

The point I wish to bring before the Senate is that the Bureau of Crop Estimates is charging that one reason why they were misled in their estimates of yield was on account of the farmers' propaganda as to the reduction of acreage. I wish to protest against them putting any such blame on the farmers who reported, because I believe that never before in the history of cotton planting in the South was there such a drastic reduction of acreage.

For the first time in the history of the country the weevil had covered the entire cotton belt, and no man can predict to what extent the ravages of that insect will affect the yield of cotton.

On my own farm there would be a field that would make perhaps two-thirds of a crop and another field that would not make one-fifth of a crop. No man could estimate what would be the final result of the ravages of that insect until the final gin count was made.

In addition to that the tremendous drop in the price of cotton from 40 cents a pound to 8 cents a pound demoralized every planter and every merchant and every banker in the South so that when the spring of 1921 came on there was no money with which to buy fertilizer and really no disposition to buy it. In the southeastern States of the cotton belt, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and parts of Alabama, and in fact in parts of all the cotton States that were dependent upon fertilizer for production, they were in some instances absolutely unable to buy fertilizer, and in other instances were unwilling, in the presence of the weevil and in the face of the demoralized conditions otherwise, to buy fertilizer.

We have for the first time in the history of cotton the weevil covering the entire cotton belt. Again, we have the demoralization incident to the break in the price from 40 cents a pound to 8 cents a pound, and in addition to that we have had weather conditions that were unparalleled in the production of cotton. So I maintain that to charge the farmers of the South in their present desperate financial condition, their inability to buy fertilizer, with being guilty for their own benefit of misleading the Department of Agriculture and the Bureau of Crop Estimates as to the amount of cotton acreage is absolutely unjustified.

Again, it is said that the yield above their estimate is based upon that and that alone. Their estimate of acreage now, to give it in their own words, is approximately 31,427,000 acres, and an abandonment of 2.8 per cent, making something like about 8 per cent reduction in acreage. I am looking into the faces of Senators who are from the South and there is not one of them who, from his own experience, does not know that the cutting in acreage is far in excess of any 8 per cent.

The Bureau of Crop Estimates claim that they have had no money to pay their men after July 1 to go into the fields and estimate what the reduction was for 1921. I maintain that the reduction of acreage was approximately what the farmers reported.

If the statement in the December cotton report is permitted to go out unchallenged, the effect of it will be to show, as is stated here, that when the farmers united and agreed to reduce their acreage some of them carried out the agreement in good faith, while others increased their acreage to such an extent as to nullify the action of those who decreased their acreage; in other words, that 50 per cent of the farmers who entered into this alliance did not keep their word and disregarded their obligations. The cotton planters in my section did reduce their acreage. They reduced it because they thought it was good policy, that it was good business to reduce it, and they reduced it from necessity, because of the price of fertilizer and for other good reasons.

Taking into account the uncertain element of the ravages of the boll weevil, the uncertainty as to the amount of fertilizer that was used, and the uncertainty of the season, where does the blame lie?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, responding to what was virtually an inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina, I will state that I myself know it to be a fact that there was more cotton land uncultivated last year than I have known during the whole time that I have been observing the cotton situation. I will say that there was a more complete failure of the cotton crop in my section of the State than I ever have known. That failure was so great as to be a calamity which reduced thousands of people to ruin, unemployment, and want.

I will say further, Mr. President, that I know the situation to be such, in the State of Georgia, at least, that there will not be more than two-thirds of the cotton lands cultivated for another year, for the simple reason that we have not the finances with which to have them cultivated.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I entered the Senate Chamber just as the Senator from South Carolina was discussing the question of the acreage devoted to the cotton crop in the South during the past year. I know as to that only as it applies to my own State of Arkansas; but I know that the cut in the cotton acreage there was greater than the farmers promised to make it and greater than they were asked to make it. The statement of the bureau to the contrary shows how little information the bureau has.

However, here is what I wish to say. For years and years that bureau has been overestimating the cotton crop. They have been enriching men who gambled in the products of the farm and have never uttered one word of complaint. So long as their estimates have aided those who did not produce, those who sell the product of the people who did produce, the bureau had no criticism to offer as to this means of information or of the information furnished them, but one time, having made a mistake by which the men who produce and not those who gamble might profit, they turn around and justify themselves in the eyes of the gambling fraternity by accusing the farmers of not keeping faith; in other words, when the bureau was not permitted to keep faith, as it seems, with the gamblers on the cotton exchanges, they apologize for not having done so and denounce the producer for having misled them, while ever since the bureau has been established it has been misleading everybody by overestimating the cotton crop and making those rich who did not produce and making those poor who did produce. That is the kind of a bureau with which we are dealing.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will my friend from South Carolina permit me to interrupt him at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish to say in this connection that we have had the greatest reduction of cotton acreage in Alabama during the past year that we have had within my knowledge. Therefore, I do not believe the cotton estimating board is justified in making the statement to which the Senator from South Carolina has referred. I had rather think that there is something crooked in the estimating board than to believe that there is anything crooked among the cotton farmers. I recall that Hyde and Holmes in the Agricultural Department once sold our people out, and that they received several thousand dollars for making an estimate which helped the cotton gamblers and which injured the producers.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the point which I desire to drive home is that this report which has been given out by the cotton estimating board is, whether they intend it or not, going to have the effect that hereafter when it is stated by the producers of cotton that they have cut their acreage to a certain extent their statement will be discounted, because it will be said, "In 1921 you claimed to have cut your acreage 28 per cent, but by a revision of the crop estimating board in December"—they did not ascertain that fact until December, although they have been considering the matter since July 1—"it was ascertained that you had cut production but 8 per cent."

Mr. President, if there were any means by which the Bureau of Crop Estimates could obtain accurate information as to the acreage of cotton and the truth of those estimates could be conclusively proven, it would be a different proposition; but I believe that the board have been depending upon their field reporters, who, in turn, depend upon the farmer in obtaining the estimates as to the reduction in acreage.

I stand here and protest against the crop estimating board stating that instead of a 28 per cent cut in acreage of the cotton crop there has only been an 8 per cent cut. Have they counted the reduction in acreage? Have they been able to go into the several counties and communities and accurately estimate whether they are correct or whether they are wrong? I wished to call this matter to the attention of the Senate and to enter my protest against the statement that the farmers of the South are venal and lying and that they have practiced this deception in order to put money into their pockets, and that this action is the result of propaganda of the farmers. Let me read the exact words, in order that Senators may draw their own inference. Here is the statement as to acreage:

1. Persistent and widespread propaganda at planting time for a reduction in cotton acreage of from 33 to 50 per cent as compared with 1920.

This board in their report is now setting forth the reasons why they made the estimate of the crop as being 6,500,000 bales at one time and then, in December, increased their estimate to 8,340,000 bales.

2. Propaganda supported by large carry over from previous season—

Listen to the insinuation—

low prices below cost of production in 1920, reduced foreign consumption and demand, with great financial loss to growers in 1920, and lack of credit at planting time.

3. Acreage reduction reported at planting time by growers affected by propaganda.

I emphasize the statement that the acreage reduction reported by the farmer was affected by propaganda.

Mr. CARAWAY. Whose propaganda?

Mr. SMITH. Propaganda that was sent out by the growers to reduce the cotton acreage.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is it so stated?

Mr. SMITH. It is so set forth in the statement.

Mr. CARAWAY. Who is the author?

Mr. SMITH. This is from the crop estimating board of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. CARAWAY. If it was known to everybody that the statement made is an absolute lie we might let it pass.

Mr. SMITH. I do not propose to let pass an accusation against those, one of whom I am.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if my friend from South Carolina will permit me just there, it is meant by the statement which he has read that the farmer was induced by propaganda to misrepresent the situation?

Mr. SMITH. To misrepresent the actual condition of affairs. But let me continue. The statement reads—

> Propaganda supported by large carry over from previous season, low prices below cost of production in 1920, reduced foreign consumption and demand, with great financial loss to growers in 1920, and lack of credit at planting time.

That is the second factor. The third is:

> Acreage reduction reported at planting time by growers affected by propaganda.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, so far as the State of Georgia is concerned, I feel warranted in making the statement that there was no such propaganda. I certainly would have known of it if there had been, and I feel safe in saying that there was no such propaganda, and that the charge that there was is unfounded.

I will add further that before W. P. G. Harding, governor of the Federal Reserve Board, made his speech in New Orleans I was offered 20 cents for my own cotton, but after he made that speech I was offered 18 cents—a telegram to that effect came in this morning—involving a loss to myself of $2,000 because of that speech, which I believe to have been made with the intent to bring just such disastrous results upon people who are not able to stand them, and who ought not to be required to endure them.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I felt in sympathy with the crop estimating board because, as an experienced cotton man, I was sure that no man could predict within any reasonable degree of certainty what this year's crop would turn out, because the elements that entered into the growing of this crop were unlike any that had ever occurred in the history of cotton growing in the South. Among those elements were the total covering of the entire belt by the weevil for the first time in the history of the country, a winter so warm that the weevil hardly hibernated even in the northern districts of the Cotton Belt, an unprecedented break in the price of cotton from 40 cents to 8 cents within a year, a reduction in the use of fertilizer, the total demoralization of labor and capital, and the unknown result of the reduction in acreage. In view of the infestation of the fields by the weevil, bad season, and the demoralization of the money market, who could tell what the crop would be? Any estimate was a pure guess; the only way by which it could be arrived at at all would be by an actual count of the acreage devoted to the production of cotton. So I was in sympathy with them and thought that they ought to be excused this year if their estimate was out of line with the facts and either below or above the actual figures; but it was not proper to say that there was only an acreage reduction of 8 per cent when the farmers had stated there was a reduction of 28 per cent.

Mr. President, I wish to state that compared with the cut last year the cut this year will be a cut sure enough. The continued low price and the disastrous results following from the weevil will insure that result. Let me call the attention of the Senate to the fact that last year my State made, in round numbers, 1,600,000 bales of cotton, while this year, in round numbers, it made 700,000. So that approximately 1,000,000 bales have been wiped out in South Carolina, and, at 20 cents a pound, that means a loss of $100,000,000 to the producers of cotton of that State. If you count that in purchasing power and in the trading power, you can imagine the condition which exists.

Where are the farmers to get their supplies with which to run the farm, including the fertilizer for the crop? So during the coming spring, not only by concert of action but by grim necessity, there will be the greatest cut in the cotton acreage ever known in the South Atlantic States. Yet the report of the cotton estimating board, whether intentionally or not, will have the effect to discredit on the boards of trade and exchanges any statement that may go out from the South that her cotton acreage has been cut. Neither the crop estimating board nor any set of men can determine just what the cut in acreage is, except the man who owns the land and who knows what he planted last year and what per cent of reduction he makes this year. I protest against this bald, blatant reflection upon the integrity and the honesty of those who produce the largest percentage of the world's cotton crop.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington demands the regular order. The regular order is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILLIS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Toledo, Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of Senate bill 1948, providing for compulsory Sunday observance in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Massillon Trades and Labor Assembly, of Massillon, Ohio, protesting against an increase in the number and salaries of Federal judges, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Mohawk Valley (N. Y.) manufacturers, favoring the retention of the American valuation plan in the pending tariff bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LADD presented a resolution adopted by the Fortnightly Club, of Grand Forks, N. Dak., favoring the passage of Senate bill 2267, to fix the metric system of weights and measures as the single standard of weights and measures for certain uses, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also presented resolutions and petitions of sundry citizens of Fargo, Turtle Lake, Jessie, Marion, Bremen, Mountain, Montpelier, Sawyer, Webster, Aneta, Finley, Sheyenne, Galesburg, Wheelock, Derrick, and Bottineau, all in the State of North Dakota, favoring the passage of Senate resolution 133, directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the conditions affecting the demand for foreign disposition movement and use of American exported grain, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. STANFIELD, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 34) for the relief of the Pacific Commissary Co., reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report (No. 366) thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 125) to continue the military status of persons deserting the military or naval service during the World War, and the amenability to trial of those persons who failed to comply with the terms of section 5 of the selective service law, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 367) thereon.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 2881) authorizing appropriations and contracts for the prosecution and maintenance of public works on canals, rivers, and harbors, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. KING (by request):

A bill (S. 2882) creating an immigration board and prescribing the powers and duties thereof, amending the immigration laws of the United States, establishing a system of alien registration, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Immigration.

By Mr. MOSES:

A bill (S. 2883) to provide for the discontinuance of certain Government publications and to establish branches of the Government Printing Office; to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 2884) for the relief of Ollie Keeley (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2885) to authorize the acquisition of lands for military purposes in certain cases and making appropriations therefor, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 2886) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Weston, in the State of West Virginia; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 2887) providing for investigations and surveys of the Weber-Provo reclamation project in Utah; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 2888) for the relief of the Wales Island Packing Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PITTMAN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 147) extending the time for the performance of certain acts under the act of Congress approved February 25, 1920, entitled "An act to promote the mining of coal, phosphate, oil, oil shale, gas, and sodium on the public domain"; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. CALDER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 148) declaring October 12 a legal public holiday, to be known as Columbus Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 149) directing a survey of Gowanus Creek between Hamilton Avenue and Percival Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.; to the Committee on Commerce.

CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT.

Mr. McKINLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the telegram and letters which I send to the desk. As president of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union, I have had communciations from various members of foreign groups indorsing the Limitation of Armament Conference, and I ask that these communications be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

As president of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union, and after consultation with various members of our organization, I wrote under date of October 6, 1921, to a number of the more prominent members of foreign parliaments, including Asia as well as Europe, the following letter:

"We of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union do not doubt in the least your warmest sympathetic interest in the Conference on the Limitation of Armament called by the President of the United States under date of July 10 last, which conference is to convene in Washington on November 11; but we are so convinced of the significance of this conference that I am taking the liberty to urge upon you and your confrères the challenge to exert every proper influence to bring the public opinion of the interested peoples to the support of its labors and purposes.

"It is upon the earnest suggestion of a number of our American group that I am writing thus to you. Irrespective of party affiliations, all of us in America are deeply concerned that the coming conference may be of genuine service in this period of the world's profound need.

"Believe me to be, most sincerely, yours,

"WILLIAM B. McKINLEY."

In response to this communication I have already received a number of interesting replies, some of which will be of interest to every Member of the Congress. I submit the following self-explanatory communications:

[From the Right Hon. Lord Weardale, president of the Interparliamentary Union.]

WEARDALE MANOR, BRASTED CHART,
Kent, October 18, 1921.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCKINLEY: It was very agreeable to me to receive a letter from you and therefore to know you had not forgotten the pleasant meeting in Stockholm which afforded to me and my colleagues the opportunity of personal acquaintance with yourself and your distinguished colleagues.

As I hope you already know, we are all in the warmest sympathy with the action of your President in summoning a conference upon disarmament, and I am sure you will find ardent support of his initiative not only from the British and Dominion representatives but from the unanimous advocacy of our press and of public opinion here.

Our parliament meets to-day, and we are considering how we can best emphasize this universal sentiment, and we are seeking an opportunity of giving it public expression. We intend to hold a plenary meeting of the British interparliamentary group and to adopt a resolution couched in the most forcible terms in order to cable it to you, but I trust our efforts will not end there, but will be continuous in their support.

America and Great Britain must stand together in this and in every other wise and humanitarian movement if civilization is not to disappear altogether.

I shall look forward with infinite satisfaction to close relations between you and your friends and ourselves. My only regret was that time was too short, and our occupations too exacting, to allow us to see as much of one another in Stockholm as we should have desired. I am very glad to know you have made an agreeable return journey, and I would add that we profoundly appreciated the personal sacrifices made by our American colleagues in attending the Stockholm conference.

Believe me, very sincerely, yours,

WEARDALE.

[From Hon. Paul Löbe, President of the Reichstag, Germany.]

BERLIN, N. W.,
October 20, 1921.

Hon. WILLIAM B. MCKINLEY, Senator,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SENATOR: The conference on the limitation of armament, beginning in Washington on November 11, arouses in Germany a widespread interest, if for no other reason, because we and our allies, in a one-sided arrangement, were compelled by the treaty of Versailles to reduce our army and navy to a minimum. I, being an advocate of concord among the nations, do not complain about these conditions if they mean the beginning of a general disarmament of all the military powers of the earth. I hope that the conference in Washington, whose sessions I trust will be successful, will mean a propitious start in this direction. We, the German members of the interparliamentary union, shall do our best to direct the general interest of our country to your serious discussions.

Hoping that the League of Nations, at present still incomplete in old Europe, and your important attempts to reach an understanding between the New World, the Far East, and all other countries will some day be united in their efforts, I wish you great and lasting success in your deliberations. With the assurance of my highest esteem, I remain,

Very sincerely, yours,

LÖBE,
President of the Reichstag.

[From Hon. H. Branting, minister of foreign affairs, Sweden, member of the Council of the Interparliamentary Union.]

STOCKHOLM, October 21, 1921.

MY DEAR MR. MCKINLEY: I have received with great pleasure your letter of the 6th instant, in which you express your conviction of the great significance of the forthcoming conference in Washington. The people of Sweden all most certainly desire that your hopes in that respect may be amply fulfilled. As to the warm sympathy with any steps tending to further a speedy and effective reduction of armaments that I myself entertain, there can be no doubt whatever. As far as those of us are concerned who are working on behalf of the League of Nations for the same object we should welcome with the utmost satisfaction any parallel movement being the outcome of the conference that President Harding has initiated, the results of which the whole thinking humanity is awaiting with the most eager expectation. That is so, because it is indeed true that if the competition in armaments is to continue as hitherto, the restoration of the former standard of life of mankind will be rendered utterly impossible, not to speak of its very necessary improvement.

I beg you to be kind enough to inform those of the American group to whom you refer in your letter, how heartily I agree with them in their wishes. Believe me, my dear Mr. MCKINLEY,

Most sincerely, yours,

HJ. BRANTING.

[From Dr. V. H. Rutger, member of the Dutch Parliament and of the Council of the Interparliamentary Union.]

THE HAGUE, October 25, 1921.

MY DEAR MR. MCKINLEY: Your letter of 5th instant reached me but yesterday owing to my absence from The Hague for some days. I read it with much interest and complete accordance.

There is much interest here in the Washington conference in political circles, but not so much among the population in general. It is not so easy to arouse public interest in questions without controversial character, which at least do not affect party politics.

On the other hand, I have the pleasure to state that the general opinion in Holland practically without exception is pacific and that the foreign policy of our Government is directed by the very principles of good will and cooperation which are living in the Interparliamentary Union. It is, I am sure, in this spirit that the Dutch delegation will participate in the work of the conference.

You know, I suppose, that Holland has been invited to take part in the discussions on the Pacific question, not in the discussion on limitation of armaments. Believe me to be, dear Mr. MCKINLEY,

Yours, sincerely,

RUTGER.

[From Hon. H. H. van Kol, member of the Dutch Senate.]

THE HAGUE. October 26, 1921.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCKINLEY: I duly received your honored reply from 6th October, and with great satisfaction I saw once more a proof of your ardent desire to do all within your power in order to promote the cause of peace and freedom between the nations.

In possession of the letter from the American group of the Interparliamentary Union, I immediately entered in relation with the different political parties and organizations in Holland and Belgium, entreating them to do everything possible to promote the splendid action of President Harding and the American Government by supporting the conference at Washington in favor of a lasting peace and a gradual disarmament. You shall receive their answers, and the Social-Democratic Party in Holland will hold on the 11th November a mass meeting in favor of your proposal.

In whatsoever I might be able to assist you in your beautiful task I will reckon it an honor to put myself at your disposal, hoping and trusting that the united endeavors of all those who crave after a long, if not permanent, peace may be crowned with a brilliant success.

Believe me to be, most sincerely, yours,

H. VAN KOL.

[From Dr. Christian L. Langé, secretary general of the Interparliamentary Union. Copy of a letter sent to all the groups of the Interparliamentary Union and headed, "Support to be given to the Washington Conference for the Limitation of Armaments."]

2 CHEMIN DE LA TOUR DE CHAMPEL,
Geneva, November 2, 1921.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Conference for the Limitation of Armaments summoned at Washington by the President of the United States of America will meet in a few days' time. The groups of the Interparliamentary Union can not fail to take a deep interest in this important initiative.

The Interparliamentary Conference, which met at Stockholm last August, voted the following resolution in connection with the Washington conference:

"In view of the forthcoming conference to assemble in the city of Washington upon the invitation of the President of the United States to consider the question of limitation of armaments and related subjects, the members of the Interparliamentary Union are urgently requested to foster in all ways open to them in their respective countries a spirit of willingness to make all reasonable concessions necessary to a successful issue of such conference, and any plan it may propose for the limitation of national armaments being just and equitable, to labor for the acceptance of the same by the Governments of their various countries."

The president of our American group, Senator W. B. MCKINLEY, has sent the interparliamentary bureau a letter pointing out how important it is that the work of the conference should have behind it the weight of public opinion, and that warm support should be given to any serious attempt at a practical result.

The interparliamentary bureau is confident that all our groups will at once do everything within their power in this direction, thus carrying out in the most effective manner possible the wish expressed by the Stockholm conference. The bureau suggests that letters or telegrams of support should be sent to the conference, and, more especially, that public meetings and other demonstrations should be organized within the associations, political or other, to which the individual members belong; the resolutions voted should be transmitted to Washington.

Mr. MCKINLEY'S address is: 613 Colorado Building, Washington, D. C.

Asking you to inform the interparlimentary bureau of everything that is done in this connection on the initiative of your group,

I am, with great respect, yours, truly,

CHR. L. LANGÉ,
Secretary General of the Interparliamentary Union.

Some of the cablegrams received are as follows: British group, Interparliamentary Union, unanimously and warmly support President Harding's noble initiative for limitation of armaments.

WEARDALE.

Central Liberal League in Holland (Vryheidsbond) sends best wishes for good success Washington Disarmament Conference in its noble endeavor to promote peace.

Danish group of the Interparliamentary Union beg the American group to be convinced of its warmest sympathetic interest in the Conference of Washington for Limitation of Armaments and promotion of peace and international understanding.

MOLTESEN.

Polish group of Interparliamentary Union wishes great success to work of peace.

CHAIRMAN DEMBINSKI.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

UNITED STATES COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 2228, Order of Business 271. It is a bill relating to the Court of Claims. It was up the other day. The bill does not enlarge the jurisdiction of the court at all. It simply affords them a little more machinery. It changes the terms of court and provides for the appointment of examiners to take testimony, and so forth. It increases the salary of the clerk of the court from $3,500 to $4,500.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] desires to offer an amendment to the bill, and as he is not present I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. NELSON. I do not believe he will offer it. I have had a talk with him about it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the bill confer final jurisdiction on the Court of Claims?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do it for the purpose of getting the Senator from Tennessee here, as he has an amendment which he wishes to offer to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	McLean	Spencer
Cameron	Heflin	Myers	Sterling
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Townsend
Caraway	Kendrick	New	Trammell
Culberson	Kenyon	Norris	Underwood
Cummins	King	Overman	Wadsworth
Curtis	Ladd	Page	Watson, Ga.
Dial	La Follette	Pittman	Willis
Edge	Lodge	Robinson
Ernst	McKellar	Sheppard
Fernald	McKinley	Smith

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] are detained at a meeting of the Committee on Finance.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] is absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to state that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] is absent on official business of the Senate, and has asked that I make this announcement.

I also desire to state that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is necessarily detained by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BORAH, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. GLASS, Mr. HALE, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. KEYES, Mr. MCNARY, Mr. MOSES, Mr. STANFIELD, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, Mr. STANLEY, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. FLETCHER answered to their names when called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate bill 2228.

Mr. NELSON. I withdraw the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is withdrawn. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order.

THE CALENDAR.

The first business on the calendar was the bill (S. 384) to require judges appointed under authority of the United States to devote their entire time to the duties of a judge.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the bill may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On request, the bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 214) to amend section 24 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask to have the bill read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been twice read. Does the Senator desire to have it read again?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill.

Mr. KING. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 581) to repeal the act prohibiting increased pay under lump-sum appropriations to employees transferred within one year was announced as next in order.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, with reference to that bill, and Senate bill 582, the following bill on the calendar, I desire to say they have been for a long time on the calendar, and I would like very much to have them considered by the Senate. The senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has asked, each time this bill has been reached on the calendar, that it should go over. He is not present, and I shall not ask that it be taken up at this time. I give notice, however, that at the earliest opportunity I shall move for the consideration of this bill and Senate bill 582. They may go over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from South Dakota the bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 582) to repeal section 5 of the act approved June 22, 1906, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] this bill also will be passed over for the present.

The bill (S. 1439) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for vocational rehabilitation and return to civil employment of disabled persons discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 27, 1918, as amended by the act of July 11, 1919, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over. It will take too much time to have it considered now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1467) to carry into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in favor of Elizabeth White, administratrix of the estate of Samuel N. White, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1807) to aid in stabilizing the coal industry was announced as next in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let that go over.

Mr. KING. I notice that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], who introduced the bill, is not here, and in his absence I think we ought not to take it up for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1016) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States" was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1375) to prohibit and punish certain seditious acts against the Government of the United States and to prohibit the use of the mails for the purpose of promoting such acts was announced as next in order.

Mr. STERLING. I wish to say in regard to this bill that certain Senators who are interested in it are not here this morning. I ask that it may go over, with notice, however, that I expect to move for the consideration of the bill at the earliest opportunity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 67) authorizing the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments to hold hearings here or elsewhere and to employ a stenographer to report the same was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 63) for the relief of Lester A. Rockwell was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The bill (S. 491) to provide, without expenditure of Federal funds, the opportunities of the people to acquire rural homes, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

DR. O. H. TITTMANN.

The bill (S. 136) for the relief of Dr. O. H. Tittmann, former superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, when the calendar was last called, I understood the Senator from Utah to say that he would probably make up his mind in regard to this bill before it was reached again on the calendar. Something ought to be done one way or another in connection with it.

Mr. KING. I have made up my mind to object.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate take the bill up for consideration in order that it may be determined one way or another. The bill is entitled to consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri that Senate bill 136 be considered, notwithstanding the objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That there is hereby authorized to be paid to Dr. O. H. Tittmann, former Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey, who resigned on April 14, 1915, after 47 years of service, from any funds in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $150 per month during the term of his natural life; the provisions of this act to be effective from the date of its passage.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I want to say a single word in regard to the bill. Dr. Tittmann, after 47 years of continuous Government service, went out of the service in 1915. If he had stayed another year or perhaps two years, under the existing law he would have been retired as a captain, and would receive $3,765 a year. He retired just before that law went into operation. I thought he should have had the full benefit of the retirement law, but the committee said they did not feel that they should recommend more than $150 a month. The need of the man is great, but that has no application to the merits of the case. If the Senate will allow me, I will read two sentences from the recommendation of the department in regard to it. They say:

Dr. Tittmann served the Government for almost 48 years and has probably the most unique record of any officer connected with the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

I may add that for years Dr. Tittmann also served the Government without compensation as a member of the International Boundary Commission, appointed by the United States and Canada, a service which normally would have cost the Government tens of thousands of dollars. The report concludes:

The fact that he acted as superintendent and also the international commissioner for Canada and the United States is a tribute to the confidence those in authority had in him.

He is now past 70 years of age and should benefit by the present retirement feature regarding the commissioned officers of this service.

Says the director:

In view of Dr. Tittmann's long and distinguished service, I feel that he merits the consideration of which the bill S. 136 would confer upon him.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I was a member of the committee which made this report, and I shall vote for the bill. I think the Senate ought to be fully advised of the circumstances involved in this legislation. I believe this is a worthy case. The only thing that made me hesitate about the matter was the fact that it may be looked upon as establishing a precedent which might be a very unwise one. If it were to be applied generally, in this department and others, it would of course entail considerable expense upon the Government, and the Senate should consider that feature. Personally, as a member of the committee, I considered it, and was willing to run the risk, and I am in favor of this bill. The Senate should not act upon the matter in the dark.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, imperialistic and military governments have always favored a pension system. Governments of this character furnish positions and sinecures to a large part of their population. The pension system has always been a concomitant of monarchial and imperialistic governments. History is replete with examples of highly centralized governments giving bounties and largesses and pensions to a great number of people. The monarchies in the past surrounded themselves with courtiers and lords and nobles and military followers, all of whom fattened upon the people. Labor paid the burden of the tawdry and tinsel shows of kings and monarchies, and bowed beneath the oppressive edicts and rescripts which wrung from the toiling masses enormous sums to meet the demands of pensioners who were the objects of kingly and imperial favor. Those who toiled carried upon their backs a considerable proportion of the population of the State, who, though they did not toil, neither did they spin, yet were arrayed in glory and lived in affluence and luxury.

The civil pensions and military pensions and bounties and gifts from the Government find their origin in highly centralized and imperialistic States. They are not consistent with democracy and are not the products of democratic governments. Monarchical governments seek to build up a privileged class, and the privileged class controls the government, fills positions of honor and trust and emolument, directs the military establishments, and determines the policies of the State.

The pension lists of Louis XIV and Charles I, of despots and monarchs of the past, called for heavy burdens of taxation and imposed conditions of servitude upon a large part of the population. We seem to be aping the imperialistic policies of the past. By legislation we are providing privileged classes and granting benefits, special in character, to a portion of our population. Fiscal and revenue legislation has been enacted in the interest of special classes. By legislation we have sought to divide the people into classes and to create a class conscience and to divide the people into sections and groups.

We denouce the maintenance of large standing armies, because it compels each taxpayer to carry a soldier upon his back, and yet we legislate in favor of pensions and in favor of various interests, as a result of which the farmer and the laborer—the ones who toil and dig and serve and build—are compelled to carry a pensioner, or one who profits by special legislation and by Government privilege.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the bill provide a civil pension?

Mr. KING. It is a civil pension. It provides a pension of $150 per month for the beneficiary during life. Mr. President, I was observing that this Republic was following the paths of imperialistic nations. It is building up a bureaucracy which is increasing in numbers and in strength and in power, and which claims for its membership benefits and privileges denied to the toiling masses, who are the foundation and the strength and life of the Republic.

We refer to despotic and monarchial nations for precedents in dealing with employees of the Government, and as a basis for the establishment of military and civil pensions. We are seeking to establish a ruling class, not only in the Nation, but in States and in municipalities and in political subdivisions. The tendency is to keep in power and in place those who hold office and to provide for them benefits and pensions and gratuities and advantages which do not come to the agriculturist and to the producers of wealth in the land.

The legislation for a number of years has tended to entrench in authority and in power hundreds of thousands of persons and to give them positions for life with benefits and emoluments and privileges, of which the great mass of the people who make contribution to the wealth and progress of the State are denied. Laws have been passed to give pensions to those who have engaged in military and naval service; and we have recently enacted legislation giving retirement privileges and pensions to employees of the Government who have served for a specified length of time. If the policy of the Government is to retain individuals in office for years and until they are unable to longer perform valuable service, then there may be justification for the adoption of a pension system.

I recall that when legislation was before the Senate, providing for civil pensions, constant reference was made to European nations, as well as nations in other parts of the world, where civil pensions were granted. It was contended that because these monarchical Governments granted pensions the United States should do the same.

A pension system will follow a civil-service policy. The theory of our fathers of rotation in office has been abandoned. Our officeholders in the main are to be persons who have a life tenure. The spirit of the democratic theory of government is becoming obsolete. Offices are not for the masses, but for the favored few, who are to be protected by civil-service statutes. The operation of the civil-service law in the Federal Government, in my opinion, has not proven satisfactory. If time permitted I could call attention to its imperfections and to the inefficiency which it promotes. It standardizes and stereotypes and reduces service and activity to the dead level of monotonous and unprogressive uniformity. In many ways it is a fraud and a sham. Behind it incompetent and inefficient persons are buttressed and protected. Genius and skill and ambition are ignored, and promotions and advancements are made by reason of other elements and causes than efficiency, ability, and fidelity to duty. Hundreds of men who are under the civil service have complained to me of the injustices which it inflicts and the wrongs which it fosters and permits and the evils in the public service which it fastens upon the country.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. WILLIS. I know the Senator wants to be fair and accurate in this case, as he always does. He should bear in mind the fact that if this officer had stayed in the service a few months longer he would have been entitled under the general retirement act to $3,765 per year. The bill now before the Senate proposes to give him not that amount, to which he would have been entitled after his 40 years of meritorious service, but $150 per month, less than half the amount to which he would have been entitled.

In other words, I want the Senator to understand clearly that this is not an isolated case. There is a general retirement law. The difficulty about the case is that this officer, a very aged officer, retired a few months before that law went into effect. As I pointed out, the only danger is that this might be considered as a precedent. I think it is a meritorious case.

Mr. KING. Perhaps I did not make clear the fact that under existing law military and naval officers have retirement benefits and privileges, and that similar provisions are extended to officers in the Marine Corps and the Geodetic Survey.

But this officer, like many others, resigned before the law became effective which deals with the Geodetic Survey. Senators know that since the war, when wages mounted high, a number of officers of the Army and the Navy resigned to enter civil life. They thought the promises of employment and emoluments were so much greater in civil life than in the Army or the Navy that they preferred to resign rather than to continue in the Government service, though in the end they would obtain the pensions provided by law.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, Dr. Tittmann was not in the Army, the Navy, or the Marine Corps, but he was chief of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. He had come up through the various grades, and, I understand, his resignation was tendered just at the beginning of the war. I do not think his resignation had any immediate connection with the war at all.

Mr. WILLIS. None at all.

Mr. KING. He resigned in 1915.

Mr. WILLIS. He was a very old man. His resignation had nothing whatever to do with the war.

Mr. LODGE. He performed 40 years and more of service; he was a scientific man of very high standing, and for many years was at the head of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, which, as I said, is a very important position. I had not heard of the bill until just now, and I only know about it from what has been said here, but it is a bill with which I am in full sympathy, and I doubt if its enactment would establish an injurious precedent. The number of men who have served for 40 years or more, and served as Chief of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, could not be great.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the feature mentioned by the Senator from Utah as to an officer resigning in order to get better pay in private engagement during or just immediately preceding the war would not apply to this case. Dr. Tittmann, at the time he resigned, was a member of the International Boundary Commission, and had been for some time, and he only retired in 1915, after 48 years of service, and his age is such as to preclude the idea that he retired in order that he might make more money in private life. He is 70 years of age now. By passing this bill we will simply give him the benefit of the retirement law, which otherwise he would not have, which applies to all officers in his position now. I think it is a very meritorious case, and, in view of his long-continued and distinguished service and the fact of his being 70 years of age, it seems to me he is entitled to the benefit proposed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the statements of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] indicate the prevailing view of the Senate that pensions are to be the policy of the Government. I appreciate that there is no chance of abolishing or weakening the pension system of the Government. In my opinion, the Government will pay out in pensions for soldiers and for the civil employees of the Government more than $20,000,000,000 in the next quarter of a century. Our annual appropriations for pensions will greatly exceed the annual cost of the great military establishment which was maintained by Germany.

However, I do not complain of pensions for those who incurred disabilities in the military and naval service of the Nation. The brave soldiers and sailors who faced risks and dangers and incurred disabilities as a result of their service should be compensated by the Government. The families of the killed and the wounded should receive generous treatment. Appropriations for such purposes meet with my hearty approval; but I am directing my criticisms against a pension system which will cost the Government millions and fastens an improper and an imperialistic policy upon the Government. However, we are following the pathway of imperialistic nations. We are concentrating authority and power in the Federal Government to such an extent that the States are being destroyed and the people made helpless dependents upon contributions of a powerful consolidated Government. I expect this bill will pass. No doubt it will receive the support of an overwhelming majority of the Members of this body.

Mr. President, when I was interrupted by the Senator from Massachusetts, I was directing attention to the fact that officers of the Army and the Navy had resigned to enter private employment because of the supposed advantages which they would derive therefrom, and many persons have resigned from various departments of the Government to enter private life because of the higher salaries promised them. It is a fact, however, that many of those who left the service of the Government are seeking their old positions, and I have no doubt that many more will endeavor to reenter the public service because they have discovered that the advantages found in the public service outweigh any inducements that have been offered them in private life. Doubtless some who have resigned would have been entitled within a short time after the date of their resignations to retirement pay or to pensions. If we are to inaugurate the policy of granting pensions to those who resigned before the time had arrived when a pensionable status would have been reached, we will undoubtedly have many bills before us similar to the one which we are now considering.

Mr. President, have Senators considered what an elaborate pension system in this country will mean? There are more than a million people in the service of the United States. With the great increase in the number of Federal agencies and instrumentalities, of departments and bureaus, there will be a tremendous increase in the number of employees in the public service; it will not be many years before there will be two millions or more in the service of the United States. If public utilities should be taken over, the number would be greatly augmented.

In addition to those in the service of the Federal Government, there are hundreds of thousands of persons filling positions in the various States, municipalities, and political subdivisions of the States. Pensions are being granted to many of them, and a general pension system, applicable to States and to all the political subdivisions of the States, is being advocated and in many instance adopted. The appetite for pensions is increasing. Much of the time of the National Legislature and of State legislatures is consumed in the consideration of bills dealing with pensions, retirement pay, bounties, gratuities, and so forth. Those persons holding public positions organize in order to secure pension legislation. An extensive propaganda is carried on nationally and in the States in favor of pensions, and when pensions are granted the propaganda persists for the purpose of increasing the amount to be paid as pensions and to add to the benefits received by those in the public service.

We are creating a class of officeholders, of persons who become segregated from the great mass of the people and occupy a different status, protected by laws which give them life positions and promises of large emoluments when they cease their active work. I repeat what I stated a moment ago, that the civil-service legislation and that which supplements it create a distinct class and retain in positions many who fail to render efficient service for the Government. However, as I have indicated, if we establish a civil-service system pensions are inevitable.

In view of the policy which we have adopted there is much to commend the bill which is before us. Any protest against the perpetuation of the present civil-service and pension system will be unavailing. All efforts to secure reasonable modifications of the system will be futile. Indeed, as the years go by, with our present tendencies, with the bureaucratic influences which are dominating, and the paternalistic spirit which is asserting itself throughout the land, the office-holding class, not only in States, but in the Nation, will increase in power, and the cost of government will progressively increase and the burdens upon the producers of the country will be multiplied. Any pleas for the people, for the taxpayers, for the agriculturists, and the laborers, who produce wealth and who bear upon their backs the Nation, will be unheeded. The tide has set in for centralization of authority and power, and we will have in this Nation all of the evils and the vices that attend centralized authority and bureaucratic governments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 2051) to amend section 3142 of the Revised Statutes, to permit an increase in the number of collection districts for the collection of internal revenue and in the number of collectors of internal revenue from 64 to 74, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 1010) to amend sections 5549 and 5550 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will go over.

The bill (S. 62) for the relief of Charles K. Bond, alias Kimball W. Rollins, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be passed over.

The resolution (S. Res. 73) amending Rules XXXII and XXXIII of the Standing Rules of the Senate so as to provide for the consideration of nominations and treaties in open executive session unless otherwise ordered was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1829) for the relief of Walter Runke was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill will go over.

MESCALERO INDIAN RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 2022) promoting civilization and self-support among the Indians on the Mescalero Reservation, in New Mexico, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is apparently not present. The other day when the bill was up he asked that it should go over. I suggest that it be passed over until the senior Senator from Kansas returns to the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over temporarily.

MONEY LOANING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 7) to amend the act entitled "An act to regulate the business of loaning money on security of any kind by persons, firms, and corporations other than national banks, licensed bankers, trust companies, savings banks, building and loan associations, and real estate brokers in the District of Columbia," approved February 4, 1913, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when this bill was called up for consideration some time ago the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] made objection to its consideration, and, as I understood, desired to offer some amendments to it. As we know, that Senator is absent upon official business and will not be back for several days yet. In his absense I ask that the bill may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 496) for the relief of George A. Robertson was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 985) to amend the provisions of an act relating to certain railway corporations, owning or operating street railways in the District of Columbia, approved June 5, 1920, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

The bill (S. 1771) to authorize the United States, through the United States Shipping Board, to acquire a site on Hazzell Island, St. Thomas, Virgin Islands, for a fuel and fuel-oil station and fresh-water reservoir for Shipping Board and other merchant vessels, as well as United States naval vessels, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that that may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection the bill will go over.

OWNERS OF SCHOONER "CHARLOTTE W. MILLER."

The bill (S. 1063) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Charlotte W. Miller was announced as next in order.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. This bill was read in the Senate on August 22.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the further consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether it refers the subject in controversy to the Court of Claims for determination?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does.

Mr. SPENCER. A similar bill passed the Senate at the last session.

Mr. KING. Does it provide that Congress shall make appropriation?

Mr. SPENCER. No; it makes no appropriation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does it provide for judgment or for a report upon the facts?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the bill for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owners of the schooner Charlotte W. Miller for damages alleged to have been caused by collision between said schooner and the United States steamship D-2 in the forenoon of Tuesday, July 31, 1917, about 2 miles east of Cornfield Shoal Lightship, in Long Island Sound, and subsequently, on the afternoon of the same day and thereafterwards, further injured so that she became a total loss, because the United States steamship Ontario took charge of the sunken schooner, relieving the salvors of the owners then in charge thereof, and herself attempted to tow said sunken schooner to New London, Conn., may be sued for by the owners of the said schooner Charlotte W. Miller in the district court of the United States for the District of Rhode Island, sitting as a court of admiralty, and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owners of the said schooner Charlotte W. Miller, or against the owners of said schooner Charlotte W. Miller, in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection, the bill goes over.

HORACE A. CHOUMARD.

The bill (S. 1856) to reimburse Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in the Twenty-third Infantry, for loss of certain personal property was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to hear an explanation of the bill from the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I take pleasure in giving it. I will read a letter which was written by Gen. Lord June 26, 1918, as follows:

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SIR: Reference is made to your communication of the 1st ultimo, addressed to The Adjutant General of the Army, which has been referred to this office for appropriate reply thereto.

I have the honor to inform you that the claim of Chaplain H. A. Choumard, Two hundred and thirtieth Infantry, for property lost in the Gulf storm at Texas City in August, 1915, was submitted, together with other similar claims, to the officials of the Treasury Department and rejected on account of the fact that the losses arose from an act of God, and therefore that there was no appropriation available for the payment of the same. The Secretary of War recommended legislation for relief, the correspondence and reports being published as House Document No. 582, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. There have been instances of bills having been introduced for the relief of an individual claimant who lost property in that hurricane, but it has been regarded that any relief measures should be in such form as to be applicable to all those connected with the Army who lost property in the hurricane.

Very respectfully, H. M. LORD,
Colonel, Quartermaster Corps,
Assistant to the Acting Quartermaster General.

The claim made was for about $2,000 and the amount allowed was about $1,500. It was recommended by the department and the bill passed the Senate at the last session of Congress, but it did not pass the House. I hope the Senator will not object. It is an amount that honestly ought to be paid to this chaplain of the Army.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator if he does not think there ought to be some limitation upon the moral liability of the Government, if there is any liability, either moral or legal, with respect to the amount of recovery for property that may be lost by officers of the Army and the Navy through storms or other catastrophe?

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps that might be so. It has always appealed to me that a general law would be a very much more expensive way of dealing with such matters. I think that the Congress usually allows such claims where they are honest and straight claims that appeal to the judgment of Congress. It would be better to leave it that way and let each individual claim be passed upon by the Congress rather than to have a general law which might lead to many claims being allowed that ought not to be allowed and that Congress would not allow if they came before it directly.

For this reason it seems to me that the plan which is here adopted is better than a general law such as the Senator suggests. I have known a number of cases presented under a general law and great injustice has been done to the Government through its operation.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that in a number of bills which we have passed we have authorized the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War to pay certain claims up to the amount of $500. I am not clear now in my mind as to the character of those claims.

Mr. McKELLAR. There has been no such law passed recently and no such law has been in force recently.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is in error. It may have been limited to certain claims, but I know we have enacted a statute—and I think the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, is aware of that fact—under which the Secretary of War, and, I think, the Secretary of the Navy were authorized to settle certain claims up to the amount of $500. I am very sure of bills of that character having been passed.

I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs if there is any limitation placed by the Government, by rule or otherwise, upon its moral obligations arising from the loss of property owned by officers of the Army resulting from fire or collision or theft or what not. It does seem to me, if officers of the Army can now take property unlimited in amount upon ships and in camps where there is possibility of collision or loss by fire or what not, and the Government be responsible, there ought to be some limitation upon its liability and upon the amount of property which they may take to those places which are presumed to be under the control of the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am not certain that I can give an accurate answer to the Senator from Utah. My recollection is that the War Department does not consider itself liable for damage to the property of officers except that kind of property which an officer is compelled by regulation to have and which he himself must purchase. If that is lost by accident or through negligence on the part of some other agency of the Army or some other agency of the Government, I think it has been the policy of the department to try to have him reimbursed, because certainly it is not his fault and he had to have the property under Army regulations. I am not familiar with the pending bill.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from Tennessee think the pending bill would come within the category mentioned by the Senator from New York?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it would not. Gen. Lord is the financial agent of the Army, and he stated in his letter that it did not come within that category.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. CARAWAY. On what theory should the Government pay this loss?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is on the theory that Dr. Choumard, who was stationed at a point in Texas, had quarters near or right on the coast, and a tidal wave came and destroyed all his property while stationed at that post at which the Government had placed him.

Mr. CARAWAY rose.

Mr. McKELLAR. Now, if the Senator will permit me, I desire merely to say that it seems to me that the Government having placed him at that post of duty, and a tidal wave having destroyed his property while he was in the service of the Government, it would be as little as the Government could do to reimburse him for his actual loss. That is my view of the matter.

Mr. CARAWAY. It strikes be in that aspect of the case we are arriving at a point where we say that the Government shall insure people against tidal waves, or that if tidal waves shall come the Government will be responsible for their coming.

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. CARAWAY. I understand that there were many other people who lost property there who were just as good citizens as was this chaplain, and who were serving the country just as faithfully as was he.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; as I understand, the regular officers in the Army who lost their property were compensated under general statute; but Dr. Choumard, having lost his property, was not so compensated.

Mr. CARAWAY. What is the amount of the loss for which he wishes to be paid?

Mr. McKELLAR. There were various items of property amounting to a claim of $1,900, of which the committee allowed $1,500.

Mr. CARAWAY. What were those items?

Mr. McKELLAR. They were various kinds of household and personal property—clothing and things of that kind.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I think the passage of this bill would establish a bad precedent. I further think that a man who makes a claim that the Government ought to reimburse him for a disaster which may overtake him, although the Government was not responsible, has a perverted view of the relation between the Government and himself. Simply because a man works for the Government does not give him more privilege as a citizen than a man in private life. I for one am growing weary of men who live off the public, who get more from the Government than they could get anywhere else, and even get more than they are worth to the Government, who, then, if anything happens to them, come back and want the Government to pay them for their losses. If a man is so fortunate as to become an employee of the Government and gets more than he could get anywhere else, he ought to be satisfied with that, and he ought to be ashamed to come back and insist that the Government shall take care of him and pay him for any kind of loss that may overtake him.

The Government is under no more moral obligation to do so than it is to reimburse any private citizen whom disaster overtakes. As trustees of the people, we should not undertake to build up an official class and to give them the privilege of being taken care of at the expense of the general public, of those people who actually work and produce something. To seek to saddle upon the citizenship of the Nation at large the obligation not only to care for the living expenses of the Government, to care for themselves and care for society, but to saddle on them every disaster that may overtake the office-holding class is not right but is absolutely wrong.

I have not much respect for the man who comes whining to the Government, like a pauper with his hat under his arm, begging to be taken care of if any kind of a disaster overtakes him; who wants to saddle his misfortune upon the backs of those people who have been compelled to support him all the years during which he has been connected with the public service. It ought not to be done.

I do not know who this chaplain is and I do not care. I think the Army would have been better off without him than with him if he has that kind of a perverted moral viewpoint, that the Government owes him something. I do not know what he lost. I take it for granted that his claim itself was recognized by the committee as being unjust and what we would call a "padded" claim, because I presume he swore that he lost $1,900 worth of property, while the committee found out that he was wrong about that and recommended that he be paid only $1,500. I do not think he ought to be paid a penny, and I do not think he ought to ask for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator, in view of the fact that this claim has been before the Senate for a long time and has come up only by unanimous consent on the calendar, to let the Senate vote on it and dispose of the matter one way or the other?

Mr. CARAWAY. If any objection of mine will prevent its consideration, I am going to make it, with all due deference to the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection to the consideration of the bill, and it will go over.

Mr. McKELLAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill notwithstanding the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Notwithstanding the objection, the Senator from Tennessee moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The question being put, on a division, Mr. McKELLAR's motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in Twenty-third Infantry, or his duly authorized representative, $1,500, to be in full for and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted as a full and final release and discharge of the claim of the said Horace A. Choumard for reimbursement for certain personal property lost in the flood and storm at Texas City, Tex., on the 16th and 17th days of August, 1915, without fault or neglect on his part and while in the military service of the United States.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] has suggested conclusive reasons why the pending bill should be rejected. His caustic criticisms, however, and his strong presentation will meet the same fate as attends all efforts to cut down appropriations. Congress, apparently, is constituted to appropriate money, not to save money; to burden the people with taxes, not to lighten the loads which rest upon the people of our land. This bill is in harmony with legislation which we frequently enact. The Public Treasury is free to all who knock at the doors of Congress. Whenever a catastrophe overtakes individual, State, or Nation, or for that matter other nations, the Federal Treasury becomes the fountain to which all resort for relief. Its golden treasures possess a healing balm, and ills—national, local, and individual—are alleviated, if not cured.

Mr. President, those who follow legislation and the general attitude of the people to-day must be struck with the remarkable growth of bureaucracy and the unmistakable evidence of the inertia and enervating spirit existing among many of the people. In the early days of this Republic, and indeed before its foundations were laid, the appeals of the leaders of the people were in behalf of individualism and local independence, and were directed toward the development of those vigorous qualities that have so often found expression in the Anglo-Saxon race and in virile and progressive peoples. Our fathers realized that the strength of a nation depended upon the strength of the people, upon their capacity for self-government, and upon the assertion by the individuals of those faculties which have ever been preeminent in States where liberty was enjoyed.

I have upon a number of occasions called the attention of the Senate to the subsidence of that spirit of independence and that love of local self-government so strongly manifested in the early days of the Republic. There seems to be a feeling throughout the land that whenever any evil exists or any trouble arises resort must be had to the Federal Government. We find everywhere a disposition to break down the lines separating the States from the Federal Government and to press upon the Federal Government the obligations which rest upon individuals and upon the States; and Congress encourages, by its appropriations and its legislation, this attitude of the people. I am reminded of the words of De Tocqueville, who said:

> The French Government having assumed the place of Providence, it was natural that everyone should invoke its aid in his individual necessities.

While the peoples of other lands are clamoring for local self-government and for the diffusion of authority and power rather than its centralization, we are pursuing the opposite course.

I was reading but a moment ago the remarkable development in the new Serbian State. Nothwithstanding the unparalleled disasters which came to the peoples of the new State as a result of the war, they are addressing themselves with fortitude and courage to the tremendous tasks placed upon them. They are not asking for contributions from the State; they are not seeking appropriations; but are asserting a spirit of independence which, in the end, will solve the economic and political problems with which they are confronted. They are learning the art of local self-government and are seeking to develop that morale and those qualities which are essential to freedom and to a progressive civilization.

But in the United States we have apostles who are giving their time to teaching the people how weak and pallid they are, and how unfortunate is their condition. These preachers of discontent offer as a panacea for the local ills and for the national ailments the assertion of greater authority by the Federal Government, and the weakening of the individual and of the strength and authority of local communities and of the States themselves. Organizations are effected to importune, if not coerce Congress, to grant appropriations and aid for relief with respect to matters which are not within the purview of the Federal Government. The demands made upon the Federal Treasury, if granted, would exhaust it, though it took from the people 10 times as much as is now exacted.

The majority party is seeking for revenue to meet the needs of the Government and the deficits which are arising because of the lavish appropriations made and the insufficient returns from existing revenue laws. The Federal Government is spending hundreds of millions with which it should not be charged, and though Senators know that the revenue which will be derived under existing law will be insufficient for proper expenditures they support measures which call for large sums, and which should not be a charge upon the Federal Treasury. The promises of economy are not being realized. The promised reduction of officeholders has not been accomplished. Indeed, in some departments additional employees have been added and we are threatened with new departments and new bureaus which will call for thousands, if not tens of thousands of Federal employees. Claims are presented which should be rejected and appropriations are constantly made that can not be defended.

The bill before us has some elements of merit, but yet, Mr. President, it is not one which should be met by a Federal appropriation. It will constitute a precedent which I submit will be a menace and a danger to the Nation. It will in effect declare that all employees of the Government may recoup losses for property where such losses resulted from fire or theft or flood or from some cause beyond the control of such employees. Indeed, it may be claimed under authority of this act that the Government is a sort of insurer of all property which the employees of the Government may lose while they are in its employ, or, at any rate, an insurer of that property, real or personal, which they use or with which they come into contact during their period of service.

If a chaplain is to be paid for the loss of his property because of a flood, why should not the private soldier who suffers losses from the same cause be compensated? And if an employee in one of the departments loses his property by reason of fire, flood, or theft, or from any other cause not contributed to by the owner of the property, why should not the Government compensate for the loss? Where is the line to be drawn?

I can see that there are some cases in which the Government should be called upon to meet the loss. If an employee of the Government or an officer in the Army is charged with a particular duty and in the discharge of that duty is required to have and employ a certain amount of property and without fault loss occurs, the Government might in all fairness be called upon to make recompense. Upon a number of occasions we have, as I recall, reimbursed officers for losses sustained by collision at sea where the ship went down and where the property lost consisted of clothing and other personal property which it was necessary for the officers to have in performing the work to which they were assigned.

I do not, Mr. President, take the position that there may not be circumstances under which the Government might not properly be called upon to compensate officers or employees of the Government for losses to property sustained by them when in the performance of their duties. But the bill before us goes further than what I conceive to be the application of a just and proper rule. The proof is lacking as to the character of the property lost, nor is there proof that such property was essential in the discharge of the duties of the beneficiary of this bill, or that he was required to have it at the place where the loss occurred at that particular time.

Senators will readily perceive that if all officers or employees of the Government may take to the stations where they are assigned to service any quantity of property which they desire, and that if loss occurs the Government is responsible, burdens will be placed upon the Treasury of the United States which would be enormous and which it should not assume.

This bill in my opinion should not pass. It should receive further consideration and we should have further facts. Moreover, if any compensation is to be paid, a suitable measure should be reported which will deal with the whole subject involved in a comprehensive and in a just way. This legislation opens the door to fraud and to the submission of unjust claims for Government payment. Legislation which deals with claims and appropriations ought to be carefully drawn, and Senators should consider whether or not a precedent may be set which will be urged in support of legislation and claims which in morals and in justice can not be defended. Legislators must be guided by settled principles and by rules of reason. Mere sentiment is a dangerous guide for legislation. There are many matters calling for sympathy and for private charity which would not justify legislative appropriations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will recall, of course, that the Government insures the life of every Senator and pays his widow $7,500 at his death. Why make a distinction?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is no comparison; and yet I will be entirely frank with the Senator and say that I am opposed to that practice.

Mr. McKELLAR. That makes the Senator consistent.

Mr. KING. Yes. There is no reason why, if death should overtake the Senator from Tennessee—and we should all regret that very much——

Mr. McKELLAR. I should, too.

Mr. KING. His estate, as he would leave no widow, for I regret to say the Senator is not married—there is no reason why his estate should receive $7,500 or any other sum from the Treasury of the United States.

I repeat, Mr. President, the Government of the United States ought not to be an insurer of the property of all persons in its employ. This bill is in line with that view. In my opinion, it should not pass.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am not going to answer the Senator from Utah, but merely wish to say in passing that I do not know that any votes are ever cast in the Senate against appropriations in payment of insurance of $7,500 to the widows of Senators. If the Senator from Utah thinks that is wrong, I differ with him, for I think it is a good practice; but, however that may be, it is a policy that is followed by the Government in other cases. It is followed notably in the case of Senators and Representatives, and it seems to me that this bill ought to pass.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I am not disposed to discuss the wisdom or the unwisdom of appropriations to the families of deceased Senators and Representatives, because that question is not now pending before the Senate; but this bill is pending before the Senate, and I should like some explanation from my friend the Senator from Tennessee, with whom I very much dislike to disagree. Can he tell me how many Army officers or soldiers suffered loss in the hurricane which occurred at the post where the chaplain was stationed?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I can not. This bill has been before the Senate continuously during this session, and it has been objected to each time it has been reached on the calendar for consideration, although a similar bill passed the Senate once in a previous Congress. It was thought at the time that that disposed of it. I will say, however, to the Senator that if soldiers lost clothing or personal property their losses were replaced. The law, however, does not apply to chaplains. I differ with the Senator from Utah in regard to that. I do not think there ought to be a discrimination between chaplains and others.

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, there is no discrimination between chaplains and other officers of the Army.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think not.

Mr. WILLIS. Certainly not; this bill can not be determined upon that basis. Here are the facts as I gather them from the bill and the report. There was a storm and a flood at Texas City in August, 1915.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is right.

Mr. WILLIS. In that disaster a number of soldiers and officers sustained losses. Now, it is proposed in this bill that we shall pick out one of those officers and afford him relief, without saying anything at all about the others.

I invite the attention of the Senator, who is always fair, to what the War Department says about this matter. I am reading from their report, which says:

> The claim seems just.

And I do not take issue with that. It does seem just.

> The War Department believes that the relief, however, should be in such form as to be applicable to all those connected with the Army who suffered loss at the same time. Inasmuch as the committee has not the necessary information before it to report a general bill, it is deemed fair to afford the claimant relief.

They are not objecting to this particular bill, but they are calling attention to the fact that there were many others in the same situation. If the Government is to commit itself to this policy, there ought to be a general act. We ought not to start out here by picking out Smith or Jones or Jackson and passing a special bill for his relief.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is nothing in the report to show that there were others in the same situation.

Mr. WILLIS. That is the clear implication. Let me read it again, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is only an implication, and there is very much stronger implication in the fact that this is the only claimant who has complained. This is the only man who has brought the matter to the attention of Congress, and I assume that there are no other claimants. It happened a long time ago.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, we can not establish the precedent of legislating in behalf only of those who complain. We must take into consideration the interests of the whole country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio further yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WILLIS. Since this particular point is now challenged, I want to clear up this one matter before the Senator proceeds. I read this before, but the Senator did not hear it:

> The War Department believes that the relief, however, should be in such form as to be applicable to all those connected with the Army who suffered loss at the same time.

That clearly implies that there were others. Now, why should we pick out this particular man and pass a bill in his behalf? It seems to me that is illogical. I want to call attention, however, to the letter that was written to the Senator himself by Col. Lord, of the Quartermaster Corps, wherein he goes on to say:

> I have the honor to inform you that the claim of Chaplain H. A. Choumard, Two hundred and thirtieth Infantry, for property lost in the Gulf storm at Texas City in August, 1915, was submitted, together with other similar claims, to the officials of the Treasury Department and rejected on account of the fact that the losses arose from an act of God, and therefore that there was no appropriation available for the payment of the same. The Secretary of War recommended legislation for relief, the correspondence and reports being published as House Document No. 582, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session. There have been instances of bills having been introduced for the relief of an individual claimant who lost property in that hurricane, but it has been regarded that any relief measures should be in such form as to be applicable to all those connected with the Army who lost property in the hurricane.

It seems to me that position can not be successfully challenged. If this is a case where there ought to be relief—and perhaps it is—why not afford it for all of those who suffered loss? There is absolutely no justification for picking out one particular case. That is what this bill does, and that is why it ought not to pass.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is not the policy of the Government. It never has been the policy of the Government in dealing with such matters. The Senator and I served in the House together. We know that there was always a Private Calendar where individual matters of this kind were placed. There has always been such a calendar in this body. It is the policy of the Government not to pass general laws that might bring in a large number of unworthy claims to be passed on by some other commission or some other body or some other officer of the Government. It has been the policy all the time, where meritorious cases of this kind occurred, that they have had the right to bring them before the Congress, and if the Congress thought there was a moral right by reason of which they should be paid they have ordered them paid.

This is not an unusual case. It is directly in line with others of the same general nature that have been passed heretofore. So far as we know, so far as I know, so far as the Senator knows, and so far as anyone knows, there is no other claim like this. Why should we pass a general law inviting others to come in when it is not necessary?

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I do not admit at all the truth of the contention that there are no other cases of this kind, because here are the two statements of the War Department, the clear implication of which is that there are other cases of this kind; and they are objecting to this bill because it singles out this one instance and lets the others go. It seems to me it is unwise legislation, and indefensible.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIS. I yield.

Mr. KING. I understand that there are a large number of persons and a number of officers, also, who lost not only their property but their family's property at the same time.

Mr. WILLIS. That is the clear implication of the report. That is what the report says.

Mr. KING. And now this man is singled out. I understand that there is a case of an officer from Kansas who was stationed there who lost his property and the property of his family. He has made no claim, because he recognizes that it was a catastrophe for which the Government was not responsible.

Mr. WILLIS. What shall be said for these other officers who have sustained losses if we pass this bill? What shall we say to them? We can not afford to legislate just because somebody asks for it. Our legislation ought to be founded on some basic principle. I think this is unwise legislation, Mr. President.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DIAL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DIAL. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STANLEY. Has the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. STANLEY. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BROUSSARD. I am paired with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLER]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. WALSH of Montana] is necessarily absent on business of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington (after having voted in the affirmative). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent. I have promised to take care of him with a pair. I find that I can transfer my pair to my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER], and I do so, and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. EDGE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (after having voted in the affirmative). I note from the recapitulation of the vote that my general pair, the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], did not vote. As I am unable to secure a transfer, I shall have to withdraw my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is detained on account of illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]; and

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

The roll call resulted—yeas 27, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—27.

Ashurst	Kenyon	Robinson	Sterling
Bursum	Ladd	Sheppard	Sutherland
Calder	McCumber	Shields	Trammell
France	McKellar	Smith	Wadsworth
Harris	McNary	Spencer	Walsh, Mass.
Heflin	Myers	Stanfield	Watson, Ind.
Jones, Wash.	New	Stanley

NAYS—16.

Cameron	Dial	Keyes	Norris
Capper	Fernald	King	Page
Caraway	Gooding	McKinley	Townsend
Curtis	Hale	Nelson	Willis

NOT VOTING—53.

Ball	Frelinghuysen	McLean	Reed
Borah	Gerry	Moses	Shortridge
Brandegee	Glass	Newberry	Simmons
Broussard	Harreld	Nicholson	Smoot
Colt	Harrison	Norbeck	Swanson
Crow	Hitchcock	Oddie	Underwood
Culberson	Johnson	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Owen	Warren
Dillingham	Kellogg	Penrose	Watson, Ga.
du Pont	Kendrick	Phipps	Weller
Edge	La Follette	Pittman	Williams
Elkins	Lenroot	Poindexter
Ernst	Lodge	Pomerene
Fletcher	McCormick	Ransdell

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Twenty-seven Senators have voted in the affirmative and 16 in the negative. Senators OVERMAN, EDGE, KENDRICK, UNDERWOOD, MCLEAN, and BROUSSARD are present but not voting, which constitutes a quorum. So the bill is passed.

ESTATE OF CATHERINE LOCKE.

The bill (S. 1535) for the relief of the estate of Catherine Locke, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator will withdraw his objection, I will explain the bill.

Mr. KING. I withdraw the objection to give the Senator from New York a chance to explain the bill.

Mr. CALDER. Catherine Locke, who resided in Brooklyn, was run over by an Army motor truck on Fourth Avenue while walking along peacefully, minding her business. The record of the case, a most exhaustive record, as it is set forth in the report accompanying the bill, shows that she was walking along peacefully; that the driver of the truck for some unknown reason ran clear across the street, a very wide street, up on the sidewalk, drove this woman up against the plate-glass show window of a store, and she was killed.

On page 2 of the report there is a letter signed by the then Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, which indicates clearly that it was the fault of the driver of the motor truck, and he suggests the propriety of Congress making an appropriation for this purpose. He states, however, that he thinks the amount named in the bill, $30,000, is excessive, and the committee has struck out $30,000 and substituted $5,000. As the Senator who introduced the bill, it is agreeable to me to accept the amendment making it $5,000 instead of $30,000. It seems to me there can be no doubt, as the record clearly demonstrates, that the driver of this truck, the chauffeur, was responsible for the accident.

There are in the record at least 25 or 30 letters—one from the inspector appointed by the Secretary of War to investigate the matter, others from numerous police officials, from bystanders, and from others—making it very plain that the accident was the result of the carelessness of the driver. In view of the facts as set forth in the record, and taking into consideration the fact that this woman's income was $25 a week, it is proposed by the committee that the amount be cut down to $5,000. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection and permit the bill to be considered.

Mr. KING. Let me ask the Senator whether he thinks the Federal Government ought to be responsible for all the torts of every person who may be in any way connected with the Government, every soldier, every sailor, every employee, every individual who is working here in the departments, indeed, everyone who is remotely or directly connected with the Government. If so, it seems to me we will have to have an enormous fund to meet the judgments or the claims which may be obtained or presented under such a theory. At common law, and under the statutes of many of the States to-day, as the Senator knows, municipalities and counties are not to be held responsible for the torts of their employees. If there is a failure on the part of the road supervisor in some county in New York to repair a bridge, as a result of which some person is injured, the county is not held responsible. You are establishing by this the proposition that the Federal Government must respond in damages for every act of omission or commission which may be denominated negligence upon the part of any person and every person directly or indirectly connected with the Government. If a soldier, a sailor, or an employee in one of the departments negligently injured some one, the Government would have to respond in damages under that theory. Does the Senator think that the Government should meet all of the claims which arise from the torts and negligence of men and women who are remotely connected with the Government?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, there are some circumstances under which, I concede, the Government should not be responsible, but if the driver of this motor truck had been in the employ of a private individual or corporation in my own State, that individual or corporation would be liable for the accident under the law.

Mr. KING. Absolutely; there is no question about that, and I approve of that law.

Mr. CALDER. In this case the driver of an Army truck going along the highway, without any cause, without any reason, ran his car up on the sidewalk. He was not compelled, according to the evidence submitted, to go upon the sidewalk to avert a collision. This woman passing along the street from her employment had a right to walk on the sidewalk; but this car was driven upon the sidewalk; she attempted to escape; it drove her right up against a show window of a store and killed her. If there ever was a bill before Congress in the 17 years of my service in Congress to compel the Government to pay damages for an accident which should have been passed this should be.

Mr. KING. The Senator will appreciate the fact that the negligent driver of the car would himself be liable in damages, and perhaps the circumstances were such as to warrant criminal proceedings against him. I express no opinion as to that, because I do not know the facts.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I will say in response to the Senator that the War Department itself, after the most exhaustive examination, acknowledges its liability, and recommends the enactment of this measure. I know of many bills of like character which have been considered in both Houses of Congress, and I have never known of a bill in a case of this kind to be defeated.

Mr. KING. When the Senator says that the War Department acknowledges its liability, I think the Senator is in error. The War Department may have admitted that the driver was negligent, but as to the effect of that negligence, as to whether that created a liability upon the part of the Government or otherwise, the War Department had no right to make an admission that would bind the Government.

Mr. CALDER. In a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Claims the Secretary of War said:

As to the merits of the case, I am of the opinion that the estate of Catherine Locke is entitled to relief.

Mr. KING. From the Senator's statement, I have no doubt but that the estate is entitled to relief. The only question is, Is the Government the one which must respond in damages or shall it be the man who committed the tort? The point I am making is, shall we establish the precedent that for every act of omission or commission constituting negligence upon the part of any person who is directly or indirectly connected with the Government the Federal Government must pay? If so, we had better have a very large fund and you had better increase the taxes.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, we passed a bill of this character at the last session. This does not establish a precedent; it has been established for years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. KING. I shall withdraw my objection and let the Senate vote upon the proposition. I think it is a very dangerous piece of legislation, and I think that Senators, appreciating that fact, will vote against it.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, to strike out "$30,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to George W. Locke, as executor of the estate of Catherine Locke, deceased, of the city of New York, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, as full compensation to the next of kin of said deceased for the death of their mother, Catherine Locke, on or about the 2d day of June, 1919, on the public street known as Fourth Avenue, near Dean Street, in the Borough of Brooklyn, city of New York, caused by her being struck down by an automobile truck belonging to the United States Motor Transport Corps while she was on the sidewalk of said street.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, it looks to me as if the right thing to do in the bill would be to refer it to a court and authorize the court to make an investigation and report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOINT RESOLUTION AND BILLS PASSED OVER.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 48) authorizing retirement warrant officers of certain Army field clerks and field clerks artermaster Corps was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1281) for the relief of Capt. Edward T. Hartmann, United States Army, and others, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2040) to provide for compulsory school attendance of children, to provide for the taking of a school census, to create the department of school attendance and work permits for the administration of this act and the act to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, within the District of Columbia, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. That measure is one which perhaps with some amendment ought to pass. It is a very meritorious measure, but it will take some time, perhaps more than we can give at this point, as it is almost 2 o'clock now, and I ask that it may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 32) for the relief of contractors, subcontractors, and material men who have suffered loss by reason of Government orders, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2170) to encourage the development of the agricultural resources of the United States through Federal and State cooperation, giving preference in the matter of employment and the establishment of rural homes to those who have served with the military and naval forces of the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 150) to provide longevity pay for reserve officers and National Guard officers serving under orders of the War Department was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 2263.

PAYMENT OF SALARIES AND APPROPRIATION FOR CONTINGENT FUND.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I report back from the Committee on Appropriations favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 234) authorizing the payment of salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1921, and making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and I ask for its immediate consideration. The House has all the arrangements made and we should like to get the joint resolution passed and back to the House so that it can be enrolled and signed. I may say also that it appropriates $15,000 for the House contingent fund. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives are hereby authorized and instructed to pay to the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police and the Legislative Drafting Service and employees paid on vouchers under authority of resolutions, their respective salaries for the month of December, 1921, on the 20th day of said month.

SEC. 2. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15,000 to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives, fiscal year 1922, namely:

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Appropriations, I report back favorably without amendment House bill 9548, for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia. I desire to state that if the pending bill, which is the unfinished business, is passed this afternoon I hope to call up House bill 9548 this afternoon. If not, Mr. President, I give notice that I shall call it up to-morrow, because if anything is to be done it ought to be done speedily.

I hope that we may be able to get the bill up this afternoon but if not, I shall call it up to-morrow.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business will be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside in order that we may finish the call of the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the matter now pending is a measure of such importance, and in view of the fact that the holidays are now impending, and immediately after the reconvening of Congress after the holidays that there will be matters of great national and international importance before us, and it is so doubtful what opportunity we may have for the further consideration of the now unfinished business that I shall have to object to the request of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. MYERS. We have three more days, I believe, before we adjourn for the holidays, and this is the last time the calendar can be called before the holiday recess. It seems to me in the next three days we ought to be able to finish the pending bill.

Mr. SMITH. I do not think we will have any difficulty in the succeeding days, after the unfinished business is disposed of, in having the calendar taken up, in that I know of no other important business that is pending. Just recently, too, we have gone through the calendar several times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the amendment offered by me, in behalf not only of myself but of other Senators, is now pending. Before the amendment is read I wish to perfect it. I propose to perfect my amendment, or my substitute, in line 4, after the word "person," by inserting the words "experienced in and," so that it shall read "and one shall be a person experienced in and whose business and occupation is farming."

Mr. KENYON. The Senator is correcting his amendment?

Mr. SMITH. I am correcting or perfecting my own amendment. I offer the amendment as now perfected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as perfected will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, beginning with line 15, strike out down to and including line 13, on page 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the second paragraph of section 10 of the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"The Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency shall be ineligible during the time they are in office and for two years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any member bank. The appointive members of the Federal Reserve Board shall be ineligible during the time they are in office and for two years thereafter to hold any office, position, or employment in any member bank, except that this restriction shall not apply to a member who has served the full term for which he was appointed. Of the five members thus appointed by the President at least two shall be persons experienced in banking or finance and one shall be a person experienced in and whose business and occupation is farming. One shall be designated by the President to serve for 2, one for 4, one for 6, one for 8, and one for 10 years, and thereafter each member so appointed shall serve for a term of 10 years unless sooner removed for cause by the President. Of the five persons thus appointed, one shall be designated by the President as governor and one as vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board. The governor of the Federal Reserve Board, subject to its supervision, shall be the active executive officer. The Secretary of the Treasury may assign offices in the Department of the Treasury for the use of the Federal Reserve Board. Each member of the Federal Reserve Board shall within 15 days after notice of appointment make and subscribe to the oath of office."

SEC. 2. That this act shall not affect the appointment or term of a member of the Federal Reserve Board appointed for a term commencing prior to the date upon which this act becomes law, but the first vacancy existing after such date resulting from the death, resignation, removal, or the expiration of the term of office of such a member shall be filled by the appointment, in the manner provided by law, of a person whose business and occupation is farming.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I wish merely to explain that section 2 of the proposed substitute offered by the committee simply provides that at the expiration of the term or upon the resignation, removal, or death of any member the person therein designated shall be appointed by the President in accordance with the terms of the bill.

I am quite sure that it needs no speech on my part to impress Senators with the fact that this amendment to the Federal reserve act is very essential. I hope there will be no objection to incorporating my amendment, allowing a member of the great basic industry of the country to be appointed as a member of the Federal Reserve Board. Unless there should develop serious objection to it, I think it sufficient for me to say that even in the original bill, as it came from the House, the Secretary of Agriculture was proposed to be made a member of the board, but that provision was lost in its passage through the Senate. We are simply asking as a substitute for the committee amendment the amendment which is now pending.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think the greatest piece of constructive legislation passed in a hundred years was the Federal reserve act. It has probably avoided many panics. It helped us to carry on the war. That bill was passed in the interest of the people.

On account of certain charges made on the floor of the Senate and in the press throughout the country of an amazing waste of money and extravagance on the part of certain Federal reserve banks, I introduced a resolution asking the Federal Reserve Board whether those charges were true or not. Their report in reply to that resolution has come in, and I wish Senators would read it. There are some of the most amazing statements contained in it. One statement is that they have spent more than $17,000,000 for a bank building in New York—the finest, most extravagant bank building in the world, costing more than any public building in Washington; more than the Capitol in which we sit here, which cost $15,000,000. They paid the architect and engineer more than $1,000,000. They appropriated $800,000 for furniture.

In the last few years they have spent $36,000,000 for public buildings in various places in the country. Besides that they have increased salaries since 1919, when everybody else was reducing salaries. In an amazing manner they have increased the salaries in the several districts in an amount in excess of $7,000,000.

Therefore, for all these reasons, I think we ought to have a farmer on that board, in the hope that he may be able to bring about certain much-needed reforms.

Let me call particular attention to some of the salaries paid in the New York banks. Six received more than $20,000; 20 receive over $10,000. They have taken men from the various banks in New York, where they were getting three or four thousand dollars a year, and have quadrupled and quintupled their salaries. They have increased salaries in New York alone $509,800.

The law requires that 40 per cent of the net receipts of these banks should be paid into the Treasury as a franchise tax, but they came to Congress in the Sixty-sixth Congress and requested that the law be amended, permitting the Federal reserve banks to create a maximum surplus of more than 100 per cent. It was also stated, when the bill was before the Senate for consideration and before the House of Representatives for consideration, that the Federal reserve system was not intended to make a cent of profit, that it was to be run entirely in the interest of the people; but they have been making so much profit, after getting the law amended so they could retain 100 per cent surplus, that they did not know what to do with it, so they are wasting it by increasing salaries over $7,000,000 since 1919, and by erecting these extravagant, magnificent buildings, one of which cost more than any public building in Washington, more than the Capitol itself.

I ask permission to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, without reading, a list of the salaries in the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and the Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond, as well as a statement showing the increase in salaries of the bank officers generally from 1919 to 1920. I offer the same thing as to every one of them. They have increased the salaries in New York $1,168,984 since 1919. In Chicago the salaries have been increased $1,408,000; in San Francisco $945,861; and in Kansas City $595,495. I have an analysis of this report made by John Skelton Williams, a very critical analysis. There are some remarks in his letter, which are of a very drastic character, which I do not exactly indorse, particularly his extreme strictures upon the Federal Reserve Board, but nevertheless I ask that it may be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The matters referred to are as follows:

OUR FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM A NATIONAL BLESSING; ITS MISMANAGEMENT A PUBLIC CALAMITY.

Letter to Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN, United States Senator, dissecting the Federal Reserve Board's answer to Senate resolution No. 153, offered by Senator OVERMAN regarding alleged "amazing waste of public money" and extravagance by the reserve board, from John Skelton Williams, formerly First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Comptroller of the Currency, and ex-officio member of the Federal Reserve Board, and Director of the Divisions of Finance and Purchases of the United States Railroad Administration.

The Senate resolution above referred to, which was unanimously adopted October 14, 1921, was as follows:

"Whereas it is charged in the public press of the country and upon the floor of the Senate that the Federal Reserve Board has been guilty of an amazing waste of public money in increase of salaries to officers and employees of the New York Federal Reserve Bank; and

"Whereas since 1918 in the New York branch alone they have increased the number of officers and employees 279, or about 10 per cent, while they have increased the salaries about 50 per cent, paying its officers and employees all the way from $10,000, $12,000, $25,000, $30,000, and one as high as $50,000, and that prior to 1918, 60 per cent of these officers never received over $1,500 to $2,500, but are now drawing salaries as high as $10,000; and

"Whereas the official reports of the Federal Reserve Board show that in the calendar year of 1920 the Federal Reserve Bank of New York's pay roll amounted to $4,639,273, and for the calendar year 1918 the pay roll was $3,104,830, showing an actual increase in pay roll since the close of the war of $1,534,443; and

"Whereas it is charged that the governor of the Federal Reserve Board has stated that the employees of the Federal reserve banks are not paid by the Government nor paid out of revenue derived from taxation, but are private business men and in the banking business to make money; and

"Whereas under the provisions of section 7 of the Federal reserve act a large per cent of the net receipts made and saved by the Federal Board shall be paid into the Federal Treasury, and if the allegations herein made are true the Treasury of the United States has been deprived of a vast sum of money: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board, as early as practicable, be, and it is hereby, directed to furnish to the Senate the number of employees, together with their respective salaries, employed by the Federal Reserve Bank in New York, as well as in the other Federal reserve banks in the country, and the expenditures made by each branch bank in the erection of public buildings and the general expenses in the administration of each Federal reserve bank, and how much of the net earnings have been paid to the United States as a franchise tax."

"It was a true report that I heard in mine own land of thy acts. * * * Howbeit I believed not the words, until I came and mine eyes had seen it; and, behold, the half was not told me!" (The Queen of Sheba. 1 Kings, x, 6, 7.)

I ask attention to the important fact that not a single one of the many serious criticisms and charges which it has been my unpleasant duty, in behalf of our Federal reserve system and in the public interest, to make against the administration of the reserve system has ever been refuted. They stand to-day unshaken and unshakable.

(A few of the principal points brought out in the letter to Senator OVERMAN.)

Actual contraction or reduction in all accommodations granted by all 12 reserve banks, including "bills discounted and purchased" from October 22, 1920 (when Members of Congress, farmers, and business men were beseeching the Reserve Board to relax the ruinous pressure), to November 16, 1921, $1,784,000,000, or about 60 per cent of all loans held by the reserve banks a year ago (p. 11).

The people of the country have, unfortunately, been kept in ignorance of scandalous conditions upon which the light of publicity has now been thrown. While Comptroller of the Currency and member ex-officio of the Reserve Board I tried earnestly and persistently, as the record clearly shows, to correct evils and to effect reforms as I learned of the necessity for them, but I have reason to believe that there was a studied effort at times to keep from me a knowledge of such things. Referring to certain errors, omissions, and operations in connection with which the New York Reserve Bank had been criticized, Gov. Strong, of that bank, in testifying before the Agricultural Commission in Washington on August 9, 1921, with ostrichlike assurance declared:

"Now, the comptroller (Mr. Williams) did not know anything about these things.

"He was not running the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. And I never discovered anything in his attitude that invited very frank discussion of these matters, and did not consider that it was very much of his business." (P. 709, Agricultural inquiry hearings.)

RICHMOND, VA., December 2, 1921.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR OVERMAN: My letter of September 12, 1921, to a Baltimore editor, printed by the Senate in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, directed attention to evidences of what impressed me as the indefensible extravagance displayed in the management of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

I cited instances where clerks receiving salaries, about the time of their employment, ranging from $1,000 to $3,600, had been rapidly increased, in some cases to $25,000 or $30,000 per annum.

I pointed out that the pay roll of the bank had increased from $3,104,830 in the year 1918 to $4,639,273 in 1920, an increase of about 50 per cent, although the number of employees in the same period had only increased about 10 per cent.

In illustrating its extravagance in management, I referred to my recent speech at Augusta, Ga., in which I criticized plans which had just been filed for the construction by the New York Reserve Bank of a huge and costly banking edifice, which I understood was estimated to cost $16,000,000, which expenditure I considered was wholly unjustifiable under existing conditions.

The conservative people of the country were distinctly shocked at those disclosures, and on October 14 you offered in the Senate a resolution in which, after referring to the charges of extravagance which had been made, you called upon the Federal Reserve Board to furnish definite figures as to the salaries which were being paid by the 12 Federal reserve banks, and the expenditures which had been made, and were being made, for the erection of bank buildings by those banks.

Please allow me at the outset to assert with all the earnestness that I can command, the tremendous value of our Federal reserve system. It is because I want this great system saved and preserved for the highest usefulness that I must decry and lament the inefficiency of its administrators and the wretched results of policies enforced during the critical period of deflation. With my special knowledge of this situation I consider it my duty to do what I can to aid in preventing a recurrence of the blunders of the past.

I have received from Washington a printed copy of the Federal Reserve Board's reply to your resolution calling for data.

The actual figures now furnished officially by the Federal Reserve Board not only confirm completely the serious charges and criticisms which I had made in this connection, but the board's reply shows that the extravagance of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York was far worse than had been charged.

I had said that "the salaries paid to about '30 officers' of the New York Reserve Bank, exclusive of the salaries of other employees, amount to about as much as the combined salaries of one-half of the Members of the United States Senate plus the salaries of the President and Vice President of the United States," which would have been exactly $447,000; but in their report to the Senate the board confesses that there are 40 "officers" in the New York Reserve Bank, and that their salaries as of October 1, 1921, amounted to "$509,800," so that their salaries were equal not only to the combined salaries of one-half of the Members of the Senate plus the salaries of the President and Vice President of the United States but were equal to that sum total with the salaries of the governors of 12 States thrown in for good measure, including, among others, the governors of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Texas, and California.

The board's official report furthermore shows that the salaries or compensation of 33 "officers" of the New York Reserve Bank increased in the aggregate to 340 per cent, and that 12 of them were increased to 546 per cent, although on October 1, 1921, the Federal reserve system had been in operation less than seven years.

In those seven years the salaries of the United States Senators, Members of Congress, and members of the Cabinet and of nearly all of the other officers of the Government were not increased at all.

You are now in a position, my dear Senator, to apply to the extravagant management of the New York Reserve Bank the language of the Queen of Sheba, and to exclaim with her:

"It was a true report that I heard in mine own land of thy acts. * * * Howbeit I believed not the words until I came and mine eyes had seen it; and, behold, the half was not told me!"

In my Augusta speech in July last I referred to "plans filed in New York City by the reserve bank there last Thursday for a temple of banking in New York City to cost, including land, it is estimated, $16,000,000, probably more than the combined cost of the White House and Treasury Building at Washington and the State capitols of a dozen States of the Union. This building with its luxurious and lavish appointments of marble and brass, its auditorium, gymnasium, club quarters, restaurant de luxe, and objects of art will make Solomon's temple of old seem quite cheap in comparison."

The actual figures of the Reserve Board show that the latest estimated cost of the elaborate buildings of the New York Reserve Bank instead of being $16,000,000 is more than $25,000,000. From the board's reply to the Senate I draw (pp. 21 and 22) the following figures:

Cost of the New York Reserve Bank's "Temple of banking," in New York City.

	Land.	Structures.	Total.
Main building	$4,797,882	$18,638,071	$23,435,953
Annex	681,531	1,528,925	2,210,456
Total	5,479,413	20,166,996	25,646,409

The reserve bank authorities were perhaps ashamed to exhibit this reckless use of public funds, and in trying to reduce the "book value" they have already charged off, for alleged "depreciation," the sum of $1,989,505 to profit and loss as their report shows. Their excuse for doing this was their demolition of the old buildings formerly standing on the land on which the new edifice is being built, but the effect of that charge off is to deprive the United States Government of nearly $2,000,000 which would otherwise have come into the Federal Treasury from the New York Reserve Bank's net earnings—or, to be exact, 90 per cent of that $1,989,505 charge off—or, to say, $1,790,559, which was thus lost to the Government by that action of the New York Reserve Bank.

In addition to this heavy charge off on real estate it is worth while noting that in the years 1919 and 1920 the Federal Reserve Bank of New York charged against expense of operations on account of amounts "added to various reserve accounts" the rather substantial sum of $1,175,887.34 (p. 384 Annual Report of the Federal Reserve Board, 1920) by which it appears the Government was again deprived of revenue.

The officials of the Federal reserve bank are very profuse in their claims as to the valuable work of the bank in connection with the placing of the five Liberty loans, but it was not the Reserve Bank of New York alone which raised these huge sums. The bonds were taken as a result of the fine patriotism of the men, women, and children of the New York district who came forward with such splendid devotion and public spirit. We, of course, assume that the New York Reserve Bank handled its part of that work ably, but it is just as well for the Senate to know that the New York Reserve Bank was not backward in asking reimbursements of expenses incurred incident to that work in the New York district. By reference to page 393 of the annual report of the board for last year, at the foot of the page, we learn that the New York Reserve Bank has been reimbursed by the Federal Treasury some $12,000,000 on account of expenses claimed as "fiscal agent," etc., in connection with the Government loans.

The New York Reserve Bank took exception to my allusion to "Solomon's Temple" and "objects of art" and in their report to the Senate insists that in the $25,000,000 edifice there will be a "very moderate" amount of "marble" required "for floors, toilets, wainscots, and possibly marble with some kind of metal, to be used for the bank screen on the first floor," etc.

In confirmation of my criticisms they admit that they have set aside "4,600 square feet" for an "auditorium," with a seating capacity for 1,000 people; "4,400 square feet" for "two clubs," one for men and one for women, which will enable those who desire a brief period of rest after luncheon, or to pursue their studies and have a satisfactory place for the purpose." (What do the millions of unemployed, who have no lunch, think of contraction policies which shut down plants and apply money called in from use in legitimate business for the erection at this time of the most costly banking edifice in the world?)

The board also admits there will be "two restaurants," each one with an area of "8,000 square feet," also more exclusive and smaller rooms where "luncheon may be served to the officers of the bank or for officers of member banks when attending meetings at the bank," etc., also "3,600 square feet" for a gymnasium "where the medical department at their recommenadtion can conduct certain simple corrective exercises."

The report also informs us that the building is being erected on a cost-plus basis, both in the case of the general contractor and of the contractor who is doing the foundation work, and, as far as we are informed, both the "general contractor" and the concern doing the "foundation" work were handed their respective jobs wholly without competitive bids. I understand that the general contractor, Mr. Eidlitz, is president of some federated association or union of employers which figured somewhat conspicuously in the recent investigation of the building trades in New York City, so ably conducted by Mr. Untermeyer, and as a result of which certain flagrant offenders were sent to prison. There were also rumors of other indictments by the grand jury which may have an important bearing on this subject.

The fees to be paid to the "architects and engineers" are estimated at the rather important sum of (see S. Rept., p. 34) $1,106,000.

This money alone would be sufficient to provide 10 post-office buildings at $100,000 each in 10 cities and towns where they are greatly needed.

The Senate is solemnly informed in the report that the foundation for the new edifice has been "let to a leading contractor in the country for a fixed fee," but the report carefully refrains, as far as I can see, from giving any indication as to what that fee amounts to. We are told that the lowest estimate as to the cost of the "foundation" alone is $1,838,000.

We are also informed that the "general contractors" are undertaking the work for a "very moderate fixed fee," but the Senate is also left entirely in the dark as to the amount of that "very moderate fixed fee." Would it not be pertinent to ask what the "fixed fee" amounts to, which is to be paid to the foundation contractor, also the fee to be paid to the "general contractor" for the building—both of whom I understand were given their jobs, as stated, without competition, although we are told that the fees to be paid to the "architects and engineers" alone amount to $1,106,000.

I ask that you consider at this point the fact that the salary of the "Chief Supervising Architect" of the United States Government, having supervision over the erection of all Federal buildings, is only $5,000.

Although the report endeavors to impress on the Senate the simplicity of the building, a table on page 35 has estimated that the "furniture, etc.," will probably cost $800,000, the "kitchen equipment" $50,000, "toilet accessories" $33,500, a "refrigeration plant" $20,000, and "lighting fixtures and reflectors" and "low tension" $244,000. The sum of $87,619 is also thrown in for "acoustic treatment," fireplace, and mantels and shades, with $16,000 added for "hospital equipment." Miscellaneous equipment, $68,150. Total equipment, exclusive of vault and exclusive of equipment and vault fees, $258,823—$1,319,269.

The board's report to the Senate shows that the formal agreement with "General Contractor" Eidlitz for the erection of this mammoth and costly banking edifice was executed on January 25, 1921. The record thus shows that while the Federal Reserve Board was sanctioning these vast expenditures, which they now estimate will aggregate the huge sum of $25,646,409, exclusive, as I understand it, of interest and taxes during construction, that the reserve banks were insisting upon the contraction and repayment of loans in districts where funds were greatly needed for pressing requirements of farmers and merchants. For example, from January 21, 1921, to February 28, 1921, the contraction in the loans of the Federal reserve system amounted to $119,000,000, and the contraction has been kept up steadily from that time to this.

It is a sad commentary on the wisdom and humanity of the reserve board's policies to find at the very time that the New York reserve bank was being authorized to spend up to $25,646,409 for a luxurious bank building, with its clubs, gymnasium, baths, restaurants, etc., the total amount of money which 6 of the 12 reserve banks were lending in 18 States, including all of the New England States, the States of New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, North Carolina, South Carolina, Arkansas, the greater part of Missouri, and parts of Illinois, Indiana, Tennessee, and Mississippi on "agricultural" and live-stock" paper amounted on January 31, 1921 (Reserve Bulletin, Mar., 1921, p. 354), to only $17,167,000, which is scarcely two-thirds as much as the sum appropriated for the palatial bank buildings in New York City, and while the money was being appropriated for those buildings, the pressure on farmers and merchants for the repayment of their loans was being exerted right and left. The actual contraction in bills discounted and paper purchased by all 12 of the reserve banks in the three months of great need, from November 19, 1920, to February 18, 1921, amounted, as the official figures show, to $417,000,000.

In my letter of October 24 last to Mr. George Foster Peabody, a director in the New York Reserve Bank, I called attention to the significant fact, not creditable to the reserve bank's management, that following my criticisms of extravagance the officers of the reserve bank, while reducing as of October 1, 1921, the salaries of practically all of their employees earning $2,000 or less, had not reduced their own salaries. The officers of the bank had gotten the biggest increase, in several instances more than 500 per cent, and they were still drawing their excessive pay.

I take the liberty of quoting the following extracts from my letter to Mr. Peabody:

"The New York papers of October 1 printed a circular letter signed 'Benj. Strong, governor,' addressed to the employees of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, notifying them that:

"* * * it appears that a continuance of quarterly payments of extra compensation is no longer justified. You are advised, therefore, that such payments are now discontinued and that no payment for that purpose will be made for the quarter ending September 30, 1921. The action announced above is the inevitable consequence of general economic developments during the past months with which all of the employees are familiar.'

"But as far as the public is informed the 'familiarity' of the officers and directors of the New York Reserve Bank with 'economic developments of the past months' has not yet induced the officers drawing $30,000, $40,000, or $50,000 to scale their own salaries. The curtailment of compensation, it appears, applied only to employees who were receiving an average of less than $2,000 a year salaries with which to support themselves, their wives, and children.

"As illustrative of the healthy effect of publicity in the matter of salaries, I will mention a case which came under my observation as Comptroller of the Currency. I discovered that a certain banking institution, a member of the New York Reserve Bank, was paying to its chief executive officer a salary of $75,000 per annum, and as I had reason to believe that this was without the knowledge of some of his fellow directors, as well as the other stockholders of the bank, I instructed the bank examiner to bring the subject to the attention of the full board of directors, with the result that the extravagant salary was promptly reduced to $37,500 and subsequently to zero, but the official still clung to the office. * * *

"This"—salary schedule, New York Reserve Bank—"seems to me to be a scandal and a shame which can not be cloaked even by the sanction of Mr. George Foster Peabody, justly respected as you are. It seems to me to be especially outrageous while we are demanding that working people, farmers, merchants, and manufacturers accept reductions in their wages or practically extinction of profits in their business, and while the evil forces of unrest and destruction are seeking pretexts on which to stir resentment against the Government and conflict between classes. These forces need no more powerful appeal to prejudice and hate than the fact that one department of the Government is reducing the wages of railway employees and another department jumping salaries up to $30,000, $40,000, or $50,000 a year, on the plea that the person favored is indispensable to the life of the Government or one of its institutions! * * *

"If we assume that conditions justify the Government in reducing the pay of railway men and giving them the choice between accepting the reduction or seeking other employment, the same conditions surely would justify the like course toward reserve bank employees paid far more than we allow a Cabinet officer, a justice of the Supreme Court, the lieutenant general of the Army, a Senator, a Representative, or the Vice President of the United States."

It should be stated that although I received from Mr. Peabody a note indicating his intention to reply to my letter quoted above, he has not done so up to this time, although six weeks have elapsed.

The official reports of Congress show that the total appropriations on account of public-building projects throughout the entire country under the control of the Treasury Department, including post-office buildings, customhouses, internal-revenue buildings, etc., have never for any year in the past 20 years amounted to as much as the Federal Reserve Bank of New York is now expending for these costly banking quarters in the Wall Street district.

In fact, the total appropriations by Congress for the construction of post offices, customhouses, etc., in all 48 States of the Union for the past 20 years, since 1901, inclusive, only averaged $10,969,776 per annum, or less than one-half of the proposed expenditure for its buildings de luxe by this one bank.

It is clear that the enormous outlay for these new and costly banking edifices is wholly unwarranted, and the expenditures now being made are nothing short of a public scandal. For the year 1920 the New York Reserve Bank, according to its report to the Senate (p. 55), paid out for—

"Rent, light, heat, and power," a total of $304,874, and for the same purpose in 1917 $62,141.

The bank is now investing in new bank quarters $25,646,409.

Let us now estimate the yearly cost to the bank of this investment:

The member banks in the agricultural districts would doubtless be glad to borrow this money to lend to their customers and pay for it, say, 5 per cent per annum, or $1,282,320; taxes on property, if taxed at cost value, estimated at $710,405; insurance and repairs, if estimated at only one-half of 1 per cent of cost of building and equipment, $100,000; total yearly cost on this basis, $2,092,725.

So that if we assume that the bank may be able to rent enough space not needed for its own purposes to pay all costs of operating the buildings, including light, heat, and power, we find that the cost for "rent, including light, heat, and power," will be increased to about 700 per cent of the cost for 1920, which was $304,874, or, say, more than $1,800,000 a year on this basis.

Probably the bank, however, will claim that the money which they are investing in these buildings would not otherwise be loaned for agricultural purposes, or for any other purpose, but would be kept in its vaults. That argument, however, does not, in my opinion, justify such an investment as this of the funds of the Federal reserve system.

Twenty-five million dollars of Federal reserve bank funds invested in land and buildings is subject to a heavy tax. When loaned to farmers and merchants it is not taxed.

Should this bank property—land and buildings—be taxed at what the Senate is officially informed is its estimated cost, of "$25,646,409," at the present tax rate, the bank's taxes, which last year were reported, including fire insurance, at only $3,328, will be raised over 21,000 per cent to the sum, exclusive of fire insurance, for this tax item alone of $710,405.

My information is that such property in New York is assessed on the basis of its actual value. If the officials of the reserve bank should persuade the tax authorities that this property, costing over $25,000,000 is really only worth, after completion, twenty or fifteen million dollars, in that event the tax bill would presumably be proportionately reduced.

Of this needless estimated loss of $1,800,000 a year, 90 per cent, or $1,620,000, would be at the cost of the Federal Government—a sum equal to much more than twice the aggregate of the salaries of 96 United States Senators.

Such a waste as this of public funds is rightly regarded as monstrous, and I have, in fact, heard it compared by well-balanced critics to the palmy days of the Tweed ring in New York City.

In my letter to the Manufacturers' Record, published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I gave a list showing salaries I had been advised were being paid to 24 of the "officers" of the New York Reserve Bank, and in doing so I said:

"It will be observed that these salaries have been increased in numerous cases from 100 per cent to 500 per cent. I have been told that 60 per cent of these 'officers' never received over $1,500 to $2,500 before they came to the reserve bank, but they are now drawing salaries as high as those paid to Cabinet officers."

The official statement now furnished by the board shows that my statement was ultraconservative despite Gov. Strong's childish quibbling and misleading attempt to misinterpret or distort it in his published letter to the reserve board governor of October 6, 1921. Instead of there being only "24" or "30" of these so-called "officers" and "publicity experts," the report just sent to the Senate admits a total of 40 "officers" employed by the New York Reserve Bank as of October 1, 1921, at salaries which aggregated not $447,000 as suggested in my statement but exactly $509,800, or 14 per cent more than I had charged.

An analysis of the Reserve Board's statement, pages 125, 126, and 127, shows that of the 40 "officers" of the New York Reserve Bank on the pay roll October 1 last, 24—which is exactly "60 per cent" of the 40 "officers"—were clerks whose initial salaries with the bank or whose salaries previous to entering employment of the New York Reserve Bank (taking the lower figures in each instance) ranged from $1,000 to $3,000 per annum, and that the average of those salaries was only $2,198 per annum—materially less than the "$2,500" figure mentioned by me. If we add to these 24 "officers" listed one other, whose initial salary as law clerk to the Reserve Board at Washington was $3,600 per annum, the average salary of these 25 "officers," at the time of their employment or just before their employment by the reserve bank, will be found to have been $2,252 per annum, a total for the 25 men of $56,300 per annum.

These same "officers" on October 1, 1921, were drawing from the Federal Reserve Bank of New York in salaries an amount aggregating $334,700 per annum, so that these 25 men are now drawing in the aggregate salaries which amount to 594 per cent of the salaries which they drew when they first came to the New York bank, or immediately prior to their employment by that bank, and the average of all was more than the salaries of Cabinet members.

The Reserve Board's report also shows that of the "24 officers" named by me in my published letter (out of the 40 employed by the bank) the salaries of exactly 50 per cent of them, about the time they came to the reserve bank, did average not exceeding "$2,500"—some of them much less than my figures—substantially confirming the figure originally given me and published by me, which Gov. Strong so unfairly attempts to criticize; and, furthermore, the present salaries of those same 24 "officers," the board admits, aggregate $3,400 more than listed by me; also 16 of the bank's "officers" are now drawing as much or more than Cabinet members, and 26 of them as much or more than United States Senators—"one of them as much as six Senators"—as stated by me.

The list of "officers" submitted to the Senate shows one instance where a bank clerk who was only getting $3,000 per annum after 26 years' employment by one of the New York banks had been advanced to $22,000 per annum in the New York Reserve Bank.

Another man who was receiving $6,500 from one of the New York banks with which he had been for 24 years has been advanced by the New York Reserve Bank to $30,000—more than the combined pay of Vice President COOLIDGE and Secretary of State Hughes.

In another case a young man employed by the Reserve Board in 1915 or 1916 as a law clerk at $3,600 has been made deputy governor of the New York Reserve Bank at $25,000—equal to the combined salaries of the Chief Justice and of the Solicitor General—good progress for a young attorney who was wholly without practical banking experience, but whose talents as a member of the "third house" have been frequently invoked by the board.

Another clerk, formerly private secretary to a member of the reserve board at $2,500 per annum, has been jumped to $15,000 by the New York Reserve Bank and is now getting as much as two United States district judges, or the aggregate salary of two bishops of two large dioceses.

"Mr. Lins," whose salary after nine years experience with his former employer was only $1,320, is now drawing as "manager at large" $10,000 per annum from the New York Reserve Bank, the same salary as the minister to Greece and twice the salary of the Director of the Mint.

While another "officer" employed at $2,400 by the New York Reserve Bank four years ago is now receiving $12,500, or $500 more than the Secretary of War.

A former "advertising manager" for a publishing concern has been given a $10,000 berth with the understanding that he is to aid in giving "literary finish" to the bank's press statements, and has been given the title of "manager statistics department." His salary is twice that of the United States Commissioner of Education and more than twice the salary paid to the chief statisticians of the United States Census Bureau.

The compensation of still another clerk to whom the Chemical Bank was paying $1,100 at the time of employment by the reserve bank is now about 500 per cent of his former pay, and he is receiving the same salary as Assistant Secretary of the Navy Roosevelt, while a $1,320 clerk taken from a newspaper office is now drawing from the reserve bank the salary of the Undersecretary of State of the United States.

The New York Reserve Bank's "comptroller of administration" has been favored with an increase from $2,400 to $12,500, and he is now drawing more than the combined salaries of the Treasurer of the United States and the Auditor for the War Department.

"The manager personal service department"—whatever that may be—was getting after 11 years previous service with local banks $1,800 a year. The reserve bank is now paying him 20 per cent more than the salary of a brigadier general in the Regular Army, or 400 per cent of what he formerly received, and the "manager personal development department," who after more than 10 years service with local banks was getting at the time of employment by the reserve bank $3,000 a year has been advanced to the salary of a major general or a rear admiral or the United States consul general at Buenos Aires.

These instances are all taken from the board's report to the Senate.

A clerk, whose salary with a neighboring bank after five years of service was $1,000, has been jumped to $6,000—more than the salary of the United States Commissioner of Patents—with the title of "manager methods and supplies department." In this connection I will take the liberty of quoting the following extract from my letter of November 2 to one of your colleagues in the Senate:

"In defending his administration Gov. Strong, of the New York Reserve Bank, cites in his defense the number of economies effected by the creation of the 'Methods and supplies' department of the bank:

"'Of the economies which he says "resulted" from the establishment of this department, he mentions "first" and foremost, and evidently with glowing satisfaction and undisguised pride, the "installation" in toilet and wash rooms, "of air-drying equipment, replacing the linen and paper towels formerly used."

"'And he mentions, "second," of obviously less importance, the "establishment of the post-office station and elimination of the express charges on shipments of currency and securities."

"'These quotations from Gov. Strong's official communication to the Reserve Board are suggestive of the operations of his intellect. He omits, however, to inform us whether his "air-drying" device is applied only to the hands and face or whether it has also been adopted in their elaborate bathing quarters. How far the faculties of the officials of the reserve bank have become air-dried or shrivelled is not discussed by the bank's governor, but it may be reasonably conjectured how far the "air" has been liberally supplied in inflating the salaries of such "officials" as Mr. Lins, whose salary Gov. Strong says has been increased since his employment 566 per cent. * * *'"

In the New York Reserve Bank's report to the board, transmitted to the Senate, its officers bestow upon themselves unstinted commendation, but their efforts to impress their importance is sometimes amusing. On page 26 we learn that when a plain man wants to reach the "officers' quarters," as they are described, he will be required not to pass through 10 ante rooms but to mount aloft to the tenth floor of the building. There, remote from the madding crowd, he is ushered into the presence of the man he seeks or of his secretary or assistant secretary. I do not mean to be disrespectful to the "officers" of the New York Reserve Bank, for some whom I have a sincere regard, and I trust they will not take offense if I quote at this point the following striking and not entirely irrelevant extract from the writing of a distinguished author which I ran across last evening in my library. The historian, whose work I was reading, said:

"It is, indeed, difficult to understand the qualities or objects that enlist the devotion and compel the worship of humanity. Travelers in the Orient tell of majestic fanes, whose mighty walls and countless columns are rich with elaborate carvings. Hall succeeds hall, each more beautifully wrought than the other, until the innermost, the holy or holies, is reached, and there is found enshrined—a shrivelled ape."

I do not wish to be understood for a moment as suggesting that the New York Reserve Bank "officers" are either "shrivelled" or that they bear a family resemblance in any respect to their anthropoid ancestors, according to the Darwinian theory, although Gov. Strong himself has testified (p. 119, Reserve Board's Report to Senate) that apparatus has been installed for "air-drying" them once or twice a day, and it has been observed that their propensities are more imitative than initiative.

But to return to the question of salaries: These swift increases seem ridiculous when we compare them with the salaries which were paid in the New York Subtreasury, 50 feet away, for highly capable men in responsible positions, such, for example, as Hamilton Fish, Robert Bacon, and Martin Vogel, and their assistants, or when we compare them with the salaries now being paid to men quite as able, and many of them more able and experienced, who are serving the Government in the Treasury at Washington.

For example, the Director of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, who has immediate charge of the production of all the national bank notes, Federal reserve currency, postage stamps, internal revenue stamps, Liberty bonds, and Victory notes, and certificates of indebtedness of the United States, and employing at times three times as many men and women as the New York Reserve Bank, receives a salary less than that paid to any one of 30 minor officials of the reserve bank, and less than one-fourth of the salary of 5 of the "officials" of that bank. Sixteen of these New York Reserve Bank officials also receive far greater salaries than the salaries of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue with his huge and almost limitless responsibilities, and 10 of them are each drawing more than the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, 1 of them as much as the Chief Justice, the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of State, the Solicitor General, all combined. Nine of those "officers" each draw greater salaries than are paid to the United States ambassadors to Great Britain or France or Italy or Japan.

The report to the Senate shows that the average salary received by those 40 "officers" of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York is more than the salary paid to the Secretary of the Treasury or to any other member of the Cabinet. Four of those "officers" draw in the aggregate more than the combined salaries of the 9 justices of the United States Supreme Court—36 of them draw salaries as great—some of them five to nine times as great—as the salary of a brigadier general, and 12 of them are drawing more than Gen. Pershing.

The money spent in unnecessary extravagance this past year was not in the final analysis the property of the New York Reserve Bank, but by act of Congress 90 per cent of those funds, if they had not been handed out with such lavish prodigality, would have gone into the Federal Treasury to aid in reducing taxation, and the other 10 per cent would have been added to the surplus of the bank.

It should also be well understood that the New York Reserve Bank's great earnings were largely made through the use of hundreds of millions of dollars of Federal reserve notes, which were furnished so freely by the Government, and upon which the bank paid no interest, while it was collecting 6 per cent and 7 per cent interest on loans which it was enabled to make as a result of its possession of those notes. In November, 1920, the New York Reserve Bank had outstanding $886,000,000 of Federal reserve notes, delivered to it by the Government without interest. Incidentally, and by way of parenthesis, the official record contains the seamy story of a case where the New York Reserve Bank, getting money from the Government without interest, loaned it at 6 per cent to a member bank, which thereupon loaned to an old customer several hundred thousand dollars at the equivalent of about 200 per cent per annum, on a loan secured by collateral, and repaid in six months. Other instances are mentioned in official records where member banks borrowing most heavily from that reserve bank were exacting interest rates ranging from 20 per cent to 100 per cent from customers at their mercy.

The Reserve Board's report to the Senate, in reply to your resolution, contains a mass of statistics intended to show the enormous activities of that bank. Of course, they are large and highly important, but I ask your attention to the fact that the "check collection" business of that bank seems rather small if compared with the huge operations of the New York Clearing House, whose clearances last year amounted to more than $250,000,000,000, and which some good judges consider is being much more efficiently and economically operated than the New York Reserve Bank.

The number of "pieces" of United States Government securities, etc., handled by the New York Reserve Bank is also small when compared with the operations of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, at Washington, which prepares, makes, and engraves all these Government bonds and certificates, not only those sent to the reserve bank of New York, but to all the other 11 banks. This highly important bureau which has been employing some eight or ten thousand people pays its head manager, or director, only $6,000 a year. I speak advisedly, for that officer was one of those under my supervision when I was First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in 1913–14.

The enormous figures given as to "gold" transfers are mainly mere bookkeeping entries; the Reserve Board and the Treasury handle the gold settlement fund, and there is no large general movement of "gold" between the banks.

The "loans and discounts" of the New York Reserve Bank are now considerably less than those of some of the large member banks.

As to the "discount operations" of the New York Reserve Bank in the past, these, in my opinion, have been entirely too "automatic." Gov. Harding, of the Reserve Board, in testifying before the Joint Commission on Agricultural Inquiry in August last, in response to questions by Senator LENROOT, virtually admitted that loans of "forty or fifty million dollars" at a time were made to New York banks "instanter," and I have no doubt the record of the bank will prove this. In referring to some of these large transactions, especially those secured on Government obligations (although the proceeds may be used for any kind of speculative loans), Gov. Harding said (p. 357, hearings before Joint Commission):

"There isn't anything in such a transaction that will enable the Federal reserve bank to form any idea of just what transactions the member bank is having. * * * There is nothing to base an inquiry on and the Federal reserve bank has to put the note through instanter or else the member bank which has made the application is deficient in its reserve and subject to penalties."

No reluctance to subjecting a bank to penalties was shown when the little member bank in Alabama, temporarily deficient in reserve, was on that account forced to pay "penalties" in excessive interest rates which ran in one instance up to as high as 87½ per cent per annum, and it was charged an average of 45 per cent for the use of $112,000 for two weeks, required to accommodate the urgent needs of farmers in crop-moving time.

Those blocks of "forty and fifty million dollars" in loans which, from Gov. Harding's testimony it appears, were made "instanter," were used sometimes, as the records will show, for all kinds of speculations and promotions.

My correspondence with Mr. George Foster Peabody and with the Federal Reserve Board and the official records will show, for example, that the banks borrowing the most heavily from the Federal reserve bank were sometimes loaning their funds largely for use—

(a) In speculative deals and operations, in sugar and sugar stocks, in oil and oil stocks, and other speculations in commodities and industrial stocks.

(b) In promoting the speculations of the executive officers of the borrowing banks who borrowed heavily, both directly and indirectly, from their own banks and from other member banks.

(c) In loans to directors of the Federal reserve bank of New York—to one director over $5,000,000 on highly speculative securities; to another for the purpose of relending on Wall Street loans at fancy rates of interest.

(d) Funds were also loaned most generously by banks borrowing heavily from the reserve bank for operations in "copra" and cocoanut oil in the Philippines or the Strait Settlements and other remote regions, when farmers at home and dealers in cotton and cottonseed oil and raisers of wheat and corn were being ruined for lack of funds.

(e) And the records show that a bank to which the Federal reserve bank of New York was loaning at one time about $100,000,000 was furnishing funds with which to engineer a notorious "corner" on the New York Stock Exchange, in which corner the president and two vice presidents of the bank which was enjoying these huge accommodations from the New York reserve bank were largely interested financially. Such evils as these can best be cured, or their recurrence prevented, by the sunlight of publicity, rather than by the Lethean ointment of secrecy and oblivion.

It is also unhappily true, as suggested in my letter to Mr. Peabody, that the institutions to which this reserve bank was lending most heavily were calling in loans made to legitimate business enterprises while continuing to carry loans made directly and indirectly to their own officers and syndicates in which those officers were interested on highly speculative securities.

If Gov. Harding and the Reserve Board do not remember my warnings to them in this connection while Comptroller of the Currency, I fortunately have memoranda which I think would refresh their memories.

It may be in order to quote here an extract from a letter which I wrote the Federal Reserve Board on January 28, 1920, in connection with what impressed me as the reckless prodigality with which Federal reserve funds were being handed out in New York. In discussing at that time a particular institution to which the Federal reserve bank was lending about $130,000,000, I said:

"The * * * not only borrowed back the entire amount of its reserve banks, but is also borrowing from the New York Reserve Bank a further sum equal to about four times the total capital of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. Frankly, are you not surprised that the officers of the Reserve Bank of New York should approve these transactions?

"Governor, this is a concentration of the funds of the reserve system with one debtor bank conspicuous for its speculative operations and promotions which, in my judgment, is not only not justified but distinctly dangerous, and I feel it my duty to register my strong dissent from a continuance of such conditions as these by writing you as I am doing as an ex officio member of the board."

This warning was given 1 year and 10 months ago, January, 1920.

Please note the following figures as to how the funds of the system were being used in certain districts in November, 1920, 10 months after my warning.

Loans by New York Reserve Bank to two member banking institutions in that city, both conspicuous for their speculative activities, over $250,000,000.

Total loans on "agricultural" and "live-stock" paper by six Federal reserve banks (1st, 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, and 8th districts) to about 4,000 member banks in 18 States and parts of 5 other States (1921 Reserve Bulletin, p. 112), $15,642,000.

The crumbs from Dives' table which the hungry Lazarus was permitted to pick up at that feast were not many.

It is no excuse for the bank to claim that the New York member banks borrowed in order to lend to correspondent banks, for the record shows that one of the biggest borrowers from the New York Reserve Bank about that time was lending to its own chief executive officer and his immediate family, largely on speculative securities, more money than his bank at the same time was lending to all of its national bank correspondents in all the 48 States of the Union.

Conservative, experienced, and fair-minded men in New York City, as elsewhere, have been amazed at the facts which have been developed in connection with the management of the Federal reserve bank of New York. In the financial columns of the newspapers, October 19, 1921, a well-known financial writer (with whom I am not personally acquainted) said:

"Disinterested judges think there is ground for the charge made against the Federal reserve bank of New York for extravagance. John Skelton Williams, formerly a member of the Federal Reserve Board at Washington, makes the charge and published a list of the salary increases. * * * There are fair-minded people in Wall Street who are familiar with the responsibilities assumed and know the ability of the men named, and in such quarters the feeling is that the Federal reserve bank here will have a hard time proving that these men could go out in the open market and get such salaries. The Federal reserve bank is strictly a Government institution subject to a small degree of private management. The officers take no responsible action on their own initiative. Responsibility for passing on paper rediscounted should rest with the directors. In changing the rediscount rate orders are taken from Washington.

"Hence, there are fair-minded men here who believe that Williams is right in his charge of extravagance in increasing salaries, and also in his charge that the New York bank showed favoritism."

From the studies which I have made of the case and the knowledge of the situation which I acquired as Comptroller of the Currency and member of the Federal Reserve Board, and also from analogies and comparisons which I have made more recently, I have reached the following conclusions:

First, that the plan for the expenditure of $25,646,409 for banking quarters by the New York reserve bank is nothing less than a monumental scandal.

If it should be desirable for the New York reserve bank to erect a building for its own purposes, such a building, with adequate facilities for the present and for many years to come, could, I believe, be provided at a saving of at least $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 from the figures now planned.

It was unnecessary for the bank to tie up $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 in land in the heart of the Wall Street district. Property a few blocks away would have been equally convenient to 97 per cent of the membership of the New York reserve bank and would have cost several millions less.

Second, that the present salary scale of the New York reserve bank is utterly indefensible.

The report to the Senate shows that 33, or 80 per cent, of the "officers" have had their salaries increased in the aggregate 340 per cent, while the aggregate increase with 12 of them was 546 per cent. Would these 33 "officers" resign if their salaries now should, in the aggregate, be cut in half, leaving them still with an increase in their pay of 170 per cent? If so, the reserve bank, I am sure, will have no trouble in getting men equally, if not more, efficient for less. I believe that with efficient management 1,000 or more of the other employees could easily be dispensed with, as far as the bank is concerned, without impairing the service, and that with other obvious economies several million dollars a year could be saved in its operation.

As to the New York reserve bank officer whose salary exceeds that of four Cabinet ministers—let me say that it is, of course, entirely conceivable that a man may possess a combination of character, brains, and force which might make his services worth $50,000 a year or more; but I must say regretfully that I have not been able to discover any premonitory symptoms of such a combination in this case. And I do know that there are eminent men of unimpeachable character and standing conversant with this situation who think, and have said, that it would be better for the reserve system if Gov. Strong—the larger part of whose time during several years in the past has been spent traveling abroad or in Washington—should be dropped from the service.

Economy and efficiency in the operation of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York are, of course, highly important; but the question of salaries paid, however grossly excessive they may be, or the expenditure of $25,000,000 for a palatial bank building are small in comparison with other faults and evils to which I have directed public attention in connection with the management of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York and the administration of the whole Federal Reserve System by the reserve board.

The unequal, unfair, and unwise distribution of the funds of the reserve system can spread ruin and bring disaster. The fact that six of our reserve banks were lending only $17,000,000 on "agricultural" and "live-stock" paper in 18 States at the same time that the New York Reserve Bank was going ahead with the expenditure of over $25,000,000 in a banking edifice is painfully significant.

When we survey the country and realize the ruin which has come to our agricultural and other interests coincidently with the carrying out of the board policies, it is clear that is not a small matter. A business man declared the other day with terrible earnestness, "I had rather have 10 panics than one 'deflation.'"

The national banks in New York City were given in proportion to their total loans and discounts a year ago three times as great an amount of reserve bank funds as our 7,699 "country" banks were allowed to get in their hour of need.

It is not a small matter to discover that if our "country" banks had been given by the reserve banks a year ago the same proportion of accommodations that was furnished to New York banks, sometimes in blocks of "forty or fifty million dollars" at a time, as Gov. Harding expresses it, and to use his language again "instanter," that those "country" banks would have received for the use of the farmers, cattle raisers, industries, and business of the country a thousand million dollars more than was accorded them. What this meant to the country we now realize.

The official figures tell the tale. They show that the "deflation" in their holdings of "bills discounted and purchased" by the 12 Federal reserve banks between October 22, 1920, when farmers and business men were pleading piteously for help or consideration to November 16, 1921, was $1,784,000,000, an actual contraction from $3,050,000,000 in October, 1920, to $1,266,000,000, as shown in the official statement two weeks ago.

The peace of the world is of transcendent importance to our own country and to every other country. The value of disarmament, which it is believed will aid in securing universal peace, is of proportionate concern. But the amount of material wealth which this country would save by a reduction of 50 per cent, or even 75 per cent in the cost of its Army and Navy, is small in comparison with the colossal losses which our industrial, agricultural, and commercial interests—in fact, the people of every class, from one end of the country to the other—have sustained and the suffering they have endured in the past year or 18 months in the debacle of "deflation." These misfortunes and hardships, many of our wisest leaders and best thinkers claim, were accentuated, if not brought about, by the mismanagement or folly of men in charge of a banking and financial system which so long as it is ably, intelligently, and faithfully administered should ever be a blessing not only to this country but to the world.

Letters I have received from various parts of the country indicate the deep interest which is being taken by the public in this vital subject. In my mail this morning (December 2) I find a letter from a Northern man, with whom I am not personally acquainted, from which, in conclusion, I take the liberty of quoting the following:

"I do not want the occasion of your recent exposure of the abuses in the high and excessive salary system of the New York Federal reserve to go by without a word of warm approval of your action. You have performed a signal service. * * *

"Indirectly, but none the less effectively, the New York Federal reserve bank is being operated to aid and abet Wall Street speculative ventures and it will be utilized more and more to this end until some day, the advent of which is difficult to predict, we shall have an old-fashioned panic. Those responsible will, as usual, escape, and other scapegoats will be found. * * *

"There is great unrest among the people, over they know not what, but it is there, and while it is only an undercurrent as yet, it will not be long before bold spirits will join you and others in this fight. I hope you will keep up the agitation and take it to Congress or to the public, so that in the end these enemies of the public welfare may be driven out of the trust they have so signally abused."

I hope the analysis which I have endeavored to present in this letter of the Federal Reserve Board's report to the Senate on this subject may be of some service to you when the matter comes up for consideration on the floor of the Senate.

With high regard I remain, sincerely, yours,

JOHN SKELTON WILLIAMS.

The governor of the New York Reserve Bank in his testimony before the Agricultural Commission on August 9, 1921, admitted that as late as February 14, 1921, the New York Reserve Bank was lending to two banks in that district $250,000,000, the amount loaned to one of these institutions being $150,000,000 (p. 649, hearings at agricultural inquiry).

This means that the Federal Reserve System was lending to one bank in New York City in February, 1921, nearly three times as much money as eight Federal reserve banks were lending on "agricultural" and "live-stock" paper on February 28, 1921 (Reserve Bulletin 1921, p. 472), to all of their 5,307 member banks in 28 States and parts of five others, including all of the New England States, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, parts of Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Louisiana, and Arizona, and also in the whole of the important agricultural and cattle-raising States of Oregon, Washington, and California, with Utah, Nevada, and Idaho added.

The total amount of "agricultural" and "live-stock" paper held as late as February 28, 1921, by these eight reserve banks covering about two-thirds of the area of the entire country, amounted to less than $59,000,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. Therefore, Mr. President, I am in favor of the bill. I ask the Committee on Banking and Currency to take into consideration those facts which I have had inserted in the RECORD, and to give us such legislation as may stop this great waste of money.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I should like to know what portion of the cost of the New York building is devoted to the construction of vaults?

Mr. OVERMAN. I think it is something over $1,000,000, though I have forgotten the exact figures. Perhaps it is $3,000,000.

Mr. McLEAN. My information is that that is the largest item in connection with the construction of the building.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think not. I have the report here, and will find the figures and answer the Senator more specifically.

Mr. McLEAN. The vaults are absolutely necessary to protect the vast quantities of currency and valuable securities which it is necessary to keep there.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was not necessary for them to have, in connection with the bank, an assembly room capable of holding 1,000 people.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know about that.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was not necessary to appropriate $800,000 for furniture. It was not necessary to have a gymnasium in the building and two or three restaurants.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator know just what control the Federal Reserve Board had over that expenditure?

Mr. OVERMAN. The law empowers the Federal Reserve Board to approve such matters.

Mr. McLEAN. I am told this expenditure was made under the authority of the board of directors of the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. OVERMAN. It was all under the control of the Federal Reserve Board, and if they did not disapprove it they ought to have done so.

A similar situation seems to exist in every district, as I judge from Mr. Williams's analysis of the whole thing. I hope Senators will read his analysis, in order that they may familiarize themselves with the amazing waste of money and the extravagance which has been apparent on the part of the board. I can not understand it. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, why it was that in the Sixty-fifth Congress they came here and secured an amendment of the law which had required all over 40 per cent of the net receipts of the Federal reserve banks to be put in the Treasury as a franchise tax, so that thereafter they could have a surplus of 100 per cent of the capitalization? Why was that done? Can the Senator answer that question?

Mr. McLEAN. I will say to the Senator that I do not know. The statement of the Senator may be correct.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have their own statement for it.

Mr. McLEAN. I think the Senator will find that the profits have not been unlawfully appropriated.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the construction of these public buildings?

Mr. McLEAN. They have to have homes for the banks.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think they have a right to give five men in one of those banks $30,000 each?

Mr. McLEAN. I do not think that has anything to do with the subject under discussion. I hold no brief for the Federal Reserve, but I wish that the members should have fair treatment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know. I do not charge it.

Mr. McLEAN. They have been good Democrats in the past.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is no politics in this matter so far as I am aware.

Mr. McLEAN. I merely want to make certain that the question presented here is understood by the Senate. The question before the Senate is the one which has been raised by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], to wit, that we limit the discretion of the Executive in selecting the personnel of the Federal Reserve Board to a man who is engaged in the business of farming, and the question is whether or not that is wise.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the question before the Senate, but I wanted to bring before the Senate the question as to the extravagant use of money. I asked for a report concerning the matter, and a report has been submitted admitting the facts. There should be some one on the Federal Reserve Board representing the farming interest. There has been just criticism of the board, and I hope some good may come from it. I believe the Federal reserve system is a great system; we could not do without it; but it is necessary that the board should have the confidence of the people. If, however, they go on and continue spending money in the way they have done in the past they will lose the confidence of the people.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know whether the Senator from North Carolina is informed of the fact that two members of the board to-day are experienced in agriculture and themselves conduct farms, and are, therefore, qualified to serve under the amendment which has been presented by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not informed as to the facts in regard to that matter. The Senator stated that he did not know whether or not a law such as that indicated had been passed. In the report of the board it is stated:

> At the instance of the Federal Reserve Board a bill was introduced during the third session of the Sixty-fifth Congress to amend section 7 of the Federal reserve act by permitting Federal reserve banks to create a maximum surplus out of earnings equal to 100 per cent of their paid-in capital instead of 40 per cent as originally provided.

I should like to know why that should be done, "permitting Federal reserve banks to create a maximum surplus out of earnings equal to 100 per cent of their paid-up capital instead of 40 per cent as originally provided." Why should the maximum surplus be increased from 40 per cent to 100 per cent? It seems from their own report that it was done for the purpose of using these funds for the erection of buildings and increasing these extravagant salaries. They have taken men from the Chemical Bank and the National Park Bank who have been receiving salaries of $3,000 or $4,000, and they have quadrupled and quintupled their salaries, paying some of them as high as $35,000. It seems to me like extravagance all along the line. I wish the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] is the able chairman, would examine this question and see if there ought not to be some legislation to stop this extravagance.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina knows that there are one or two committees or commissions which have been constituted for the very purpose he indicates, and I think their reports are nearly prepared. The Senator from North Carolina will also remember that the ex-Comptroller of the Currency, Mr. Williams, brought these matters up, and that his charges have been investigated by a committee—a very good committee, as I understand—and that committee is now about to make its report. There is also an agricultural commission which is examining this question, and its report, as I understand, is nearly ready.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not know that. I hope that they may make a report concerning the facts.

Mr. McLEAN. I hope that this matter may be postponed until such reports may be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Joint Commission on Agricultural Inquiry is not investigating the question which has been brought forward by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. Its investigations, I think, have related to the subject which grew out of the instructions by Congress to the commission to investigate the adequacy or inadequacy of the banking and credit facilities. We have not gone into the question of the salaries which are paid by the Federal Reserve Board, because the commission has not seen that that is germane to the subject matter of our inquiry.

Mr. OVERMAN. I trust that this criticism may bring about some reform. I think it is a just criticism, and I think I have said all I care to say about the matter.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if my friend from North Carolina will permit me just a moment, I desire to suggest that the Senator from Connecticut a little while ago reminded the Senator from North Carolina that the members of the Federal Reserve Board were Democrats—that is, that they were going under the name of Democrats at the time they were appointed—and I suppose they were Democrats at that time; but I read upon this floor an article from the Washington Times, which was printed, I believe, in April of this year, stating that Gov. Harding, who is holding his position at the head of that board, had supported the Republican ticket last fall and that it was understood that "the powers that be" were very friendly to him. I do not care whether he is a Democrat or a Republican; that does not enter into this matter. Those who have been intrusted with power over the currency and credit of this country ought to be made to perform their duties, whether they are Democrats or Republicans. If men change their politics in order to suit the incoming administration, that is a reason why they should be removed more quickly, because if they will do that for that purpose they will also change their policies to please some other powers in this country. I think the President would greatly please the American people if he were to remove every member of the board. This board is discredited and the day of its usefulness is over.

FOUR-POWER AND OTHER TREATIES.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to place in the RECORD this morning five treaties:

First. The proposed four-power treaty.

Second. The Anglo-Japanese alliance treaty.

Third. The treaty between the United States and Great Britain signed September 15, 1914.

Fourth. The treaty between the United States and France signed September 15, 1914.

Fifth. The treaty between the United States and Japan signed May 5, 1908, with the statement furnished me by the Executive Secretary of the Senate that this treaty was renewed on August 24, 1913, for five years, and again renewed by treaty ratified October 10, 1918, for five years.

The two treaties between Great Britain and France and the United States provide, as will be seen from reading them, that in the event of any difference between the parties that they will submit such difference for an investigation and report to a commission known as the international commission, to be composed of five members.

> Each country, by means of its Government, chooses two members, one from its own subjects, the other from among those of the third State. The two Governments, after agreement, will name the fifth member, on condition, however, that he be not a citizen of either of these two countries. Each commissioner shall hold his place during a term of four years.

The report of this commission is to be presented within a period of one year, and until the report is made the contracting nations bind themselves not to declare war nor open hostilities.

I want to call these treaties to the special attention of the Senate, with the view of ascertaining what will be the effect of the proposed four-power treaty upon these very effective treaties now in existence between three of the great nations for the purpose of settling by arbitration international disputes. No mention is made of these treaties in the four-power treaty, and the question arises, inasmuch as they are inconsistent with the four-power treaty, would not these arbitration treaties be repealed by the adoption of the four-power treaty?

The situation with respect to Japan is somewhat different. Japan did not sign a treaty like those which are signed by France and Great Britain, but the treaty above referred to, which she did sign, bound her to submit all differences of a legal nature to the Permanent Court of Arbitration established at The Hague, and the question that arises is, Is this treaty of arbitration between Japan and the United States repealed by the proposed four-power treaty? Without expressing any opinion as to the four-power treaty at this time, it seems to me that its effect upon the treaties of arbitration now existing between the four powers should be very carefully examined into by Senators. For this reason I am asking unanimous consent that the five treaties be printed in the RECORD, all together, for the convenience of Senators and the public.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The treaties referred to are as follows:

TEXT OF FOUR-POWER TREATY.

The United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan,

With a view to the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the regions of the Pacific Ocean,

(1) Have determined to conclude a treaty to this effect and have appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America,

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India,

And for the Dominion of Canada, ———,

For the Commonwealth of Australia,——,

For the Dominion of New Zealand, ———,

For India, ———,

The President of the French Republic,

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan,

Who, having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the regions of the Pacific Ocean.

If there should develop between any of the high contracting parties a controversy arising out of any Pacific question and involving their said rights which is not satisfactorily settled by diplomacy and is likely to affect the harmonious accord now happily subsisting between them, they shall invite the high contracting parties to a joint conference, to which the whole subject will be referred for consideration and adjustment.

ARTICLE II.

If the said rights are threatened by the aggressive action of any other power, the high contracting parties shall communicate with one another fully and frankly in order to arrive at an understanding as to the most efficient measures to be taken, jointly and separately, to meet the exigencies of the particular situation.

ARTICLE III.

This agreement shall remain in force for 10 years from the time it shall take effect, and after the expiration of said period it shall continue to be in force, subject to the right of any of the high contracting parties to terminate it upon 12 months' notice.

ARTICLE IV.

This agreement shall be ratified as soon as possible in accordance with the constitutional methods of the high contracting parties, and shall take effect on the deposit of ratifications, which shall take place at Washington, and thereupon the agreement between Great Britain and Japan, which was concluded at London on July 13, 1911, shall terminate.

TEXT OF ANGLO-JAPANESE TREATY.

PREAMBLE.

The Government of Great Britain and the Government of Japan, having in view the important changes which have taken place in the situation since the conclusion of the Anglo-Japanese agreement of the 12th August, 1905, and believing that a revision of that agreement responding to such changes would contribute to general stability and repose, have agreed upon the following stipulations to replace the agreement above mentioned, such stipulations having the same object as the said agreement, namely:

(a) The consolidation and maintenance of the general peace in the regions of eastern Asia and of India.

(b) The preservation of the common interests of all powers in China by insuring the independence and integrity of the Chinese Empire and the principle of equal opportunities for the commerce and industry of all nations in China.

(c) The maintenance of the territorial rights of the high contracting parties in the regions of eastern Asia and of India, and the defense of their special interests in the said regions.

ARTICLE I.

It is agreed that whenever, in the opinion of either Great Britain or Japan, any of the rights and interests referred to in the preamble of this agreement are in jeopardy, the two Governments will communicate with one another fully and frankly, and will consider in common the measures which should be taken to safeguard those menaced rights or interests.

ARTICLE II.

If by reason of unprovoked attack or aggressive action, wherever arising, on the part of any power or powers, either high contracting party should be involved in war in defense of its territorial rights or special interests mentioned in the preamble of this agreement, the other high contracting party will at once come to the assistance of its ally, and will conduct the war in common, and make peace in mutual agreement with it.

ARTICLE III.

The high contracting parties agree that neither of them will, without consulting the other, enter into separate arrangements with another power to the prejudice of the objects described in the preamble of this agreement.

ARTICLE IV.

Should either high contracting party conclude a treaty of general arbitration with a third power, it is agreed that nothing in this agreement shall entail upon such contracting party an obligation to go to war with the power with whom such treaty of arbitration is in force.

ARTICLE V.

The conditions under which armed assistance shall be afforded by either power to the other in the circumstances mentioned in the present agreement and the means by which such assistance is to be made available will be arranged by the naval and military authorities of the high contracting parties, who will from time to time consult one another fully and freely upon all questions of mutual interest.

ARTICLE VI.

The present agreement shall come into effect immediately after the date of its signature, and remain in force for 10 years from that date.

In case neither of the high contracting parties should have notified 12 months before the expiration of the said 10 years the intention of terminating it, it shall remain binding until the expiration of one year from the day on which either of the high contracting parties shall have denounced it. But if, when the date fixed for its expiration arrives, either ally is actually engaged in war the alliance shall, ipso facto, continue until peace is concluded.

In faith whereof the undersigned, duly authorized by their respective Governments, have signed this agreement and have affixed thereto their seals.

Done in duplicate at London the 13th day of July, 1911.

E. GREY,
His Britannic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

TAKAAKI KATO,
Ambassador Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan at the Court of St. James.

TREATY BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN.

The President of the United States of America and His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, being desirous to strengthen the bonds of amity that bind them together and also to advance the cause of general peace, have resolved to enter into a treaty for that purpose, and to that end have appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State of the United States; and

His Britannic Majesty, the Right Hon. Sir Cecil Arthur Spring-Rice, G. C. V. O., K. C. M. G., etc., his ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary at Washington;

Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in proper form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

The high contracting parties agree that all disputes between them, of every nature whatsoever, other than disputes the settlement of which is provided for and in fact achieved under existing agreements between the high contracting parties, shall, when diplomatic methods of adjustment have failed, be referred for investigation and report to a permanent international commission, to be constituted in the manner prescribed in the next succeeding article; and they agree not to declare war or begin hostilities during such investigation and before the report is submitted.

ARTICLE II.

The international commission shall be composed of five members, to be appointed as follows: One member shall be chosen from each country, by the Government thereof; one member shall be chosen by each Government from some third country; the fifth member shall be chosen by common agreement between the two Governments, it being understood that he shall not be a citizen of either country. The expenses of the commission shall be paid by the two Governments in equal proportions.

The international commission shall be appointed within six months after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty; and vacancies shall be filled according to the manner of the original appointment.

ARTICLE III.

In case the high contracting parties shall have failed to adjust a dispute by diplomatic methods, they shall at once refer it to the international commission for investigation and report. The international commission may, however, spontaneously by unanimous agreement offer its services to that effect, and in such case it shall notify both Governments and request their cooperation in the investigation.

In the event of its appearing to His Majesty's Government that the British interests affected by the dispute to be investigated are not mainly those of the United Kingdom, but are mainly those of some one or more of the self-governing dominions, namely, the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, and Newfoundland, His Majesty's Government shall be at liberty to substitute as the member chosen by them to serve on the International Commission for such investigation and report another person selected from a list of persons to be named one for each of the self-governing dominions, but only one shall act, namely, that one who represents the dominion immediately interested.

The high contracting parties agree to furnish the Permanent International Commission with all the means and facilities required for its investigation and report.

The report of the International Commission shall be completed within one year after the date on which it shall declare its investigation to have begun, unless the high contracting parties shall limit or extend the time by mutual agreement. The report shall be prepared in triplicate; one copy shall be presented to each Government, and the third retained by the commission for its files.

The high contracting parties reserve the right to act independently on the subject matter of the dispute after the report of the commission shall have been submitted.

ARTICLE IV.

This treaty shall not affect in any way the provisions of the treaty of the 11th January, 1909, relating to questions arising between the United States and Canada.

ARTICLE V.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible. It shall take effect immediately after the exchange of ratifications, and shall continue in force for a period of five years; and it shall thereafter remain in force until 12 months after one of the high contracting parties have given notice to the other of an intention to terminate it.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty and have affixed thereunto their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington on the 15th day of September, in the year of our Lord 1914.

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND FRANCE.

The President of the United States of America and the President of the French Republic, desiring to strengthen the friendly relations which unite their two countries and to serve the cause of general peace, have decided to conclude a treaty for these purposes and have consequently appointed the plenipotentiaries designated hereinafter, to wit:

The President of the United States of America; the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State of the United States; and

The President of the French Republic; His Excellency J. J. Jusserand, ambassador of the French Republic to the United States;

Who, after exhibiting to each other their full powers, found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

Any disputes arising between the Government of the United States of America and the Government of the French Republic, of whatever nature they may be, shall, when ordinary diplomatic proceedings have failed and the high contracting parties do not have recourse to arbitration, be submitted for investigation and report to a permanent international commission constituted in the manner prescribed in the following article.

The high contracting parties agree not to resort, with respect to each other, to any act of force during the investigation to be made by the commission and before its report is handed in.

ARTICLE 2.

The international commission shall be composed of five members appointed as follows: Each Government shall designate two members, only one of whom shall be of its own nationality; the fifth member shall be designated by common consent and shall not belong to any of the nationalities already represented on the commission; he shall perform the duties of president.

In case the two Governments should be unable to agree on the choice of the fifth commissioner, the other four shall be called upon to designate him, and failing an understanding between them, the provisions of article 45 of The Hague convention of 1907 shall be applied.

The commission shall be organized within six months from the exchange of ratifications of the present convention.

The members shall be appointed for one year and their appointment may be renewed. They shall remain in office until superseded or reappointed, or until the work on which they are engaged at the time their office expires is completed.

Any vacancies which may arise (from death, resignation, or cases of physical or moral incapacity) shall be filled within the shortest possible period in the manner followed for the original appointment.

The high contracting parties shall, before designating the commissioners, reach an understanding in regard to their compensation. They shall bear by halves the expenses incident to the meeting of the commission.

ARTICLE 3.

In case a dispute should arise between the high contracting parties which is not settled by the ordinary methods, each party shall have a right to ask that the investigation thereof be intrusted to the international commission charged with making a report. Notice shall be given to the president of the international commission, who shall at once communicate with his colleagues.

In the same case the president may, after consulting his colleagues and upon receiving the consent of a majority of the members of the commission, offer the services of the latter to each of the contracting parties. Acceptance of that offer declared by one of the two Governments shall be sufficient to give jurisdiction of the case to the commission in accordance with the foregoing paragraph.

The place of meeting shall be determined by the commission itself.

ARTICLE 4.

The two high contracting parties shall have a right, each on its own part, to state to the president of the commission what is the subject matter of the controversy. No difference in these statements, which shall be furnished by way of suggestion, shall arrest the action of the commission.

In case the cause of the dispute should consist of certain acts already committed or about to be committed, the commission shall as soon as possible indicate what measures to preserve the rights of each party ought in its opinion to be taken provisionally and pending the delivery of its report.

ARTICLE 5.

As regards the procedure which it is to follow, the commission shall as far as possible be guided by the provisions contained in articles 9 to 36 of convention I of The Hague of 1907.

The high contracting parties agree to afford the commission all means and all necessary facilities for its investigation and report.

The work of the commission shall be completed within one year from the date on which it has taken jurisdiction of the case, unless the high contracting parties should agree to set a different period.

The conclusion of the commission and the terms of its report shall be adopted by a majority. The report, signed only by the President acting by virtue of his office, shall be transmitted by him to each of the contracting parties.

The high contracting parties reserve full liberty as to the action to be taken on the report of the commission.

ARTICLE 6.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States of America, with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and by the President of the French Republic, in accordance with the constitutional laws of France.

It shall go into force immediately after the exchange of ratifications, and shall last five years.

Unless denounced six months at least before the expiration of the said period of five years, it shall remain in force until the expiration of a period of 12 months after either party shall have notified the other of its intention to terminate it.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present treaty and have affixed thereunto their seals.

Done at Washington this 15th day of September, in the year 1914.

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND JAPAN.

The President of the United States of America and His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, taking into consideration the fact that the high contracting parties to the convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes, concluded at The Hague on the 29th July, 1899, have reserved to themselves, by Article XIX of that convention, the right of concluding agreements, with a view to referring to arbitration all questions which they shall consider possible to submit to such treatment, have resolved to conclude an arbitration convention between the two countries, and for the purpose have named as their plenipotentiaries, that is to say:

The President of the United States of America, Elihu Root, Secretary of State of the United States of America; and

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, Baron Kogoro Takahira, Shosammi, Grand Cordon of the Imperial Order of the Rising Sun, his ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States of America:

Who, after having communicated to each other their full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I.

Difference which may arise of a legal nature, or relating to the interpretation of treaties existing between the two contracting parties, and which it may not have been possible to settle by diplomacy, shall be referred to the permanent court of arbitration established at The Hague by the convention of the 29th July, 1899, provided, nevertheless, that they do not affect the vital interests, the independence, or the honor of the two contracting States, and do not concern the interests of third parties.

ARTICLE II.

In each individual case the high contracting parties, before appealing to the permanent court of arbitration shall conclude a special agreement defining clearly the matter in dispute, the scope of the powers of the arbitrators, and the period to be fixed for the formation of the arbitral tribunal and the several stages of the procedure. It is understood that such special agreements will be made on the part of the United States by the President of the United States by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof.

Such agreements shall be binding only when confirmed by the two Governments by an exchange of notes.

ARTICLE III.

The present convention shall remain in force for the period of five years from the date of the exchange of the ratifications.

ARTICLE IV.

The present convention shall be ratified by the high contracting parties, and the ratifications thereof shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed the present convention and have thereunto affixed their seals.

Done at the city of Washington, in duplicate, this 5th day of May, 1908, corresponding to the 5th day of the fifth month of the forty-first year of Meiji.

ELIHU ROOT. [SEAL].
K. TAKAHIRA. [SEAL.]

[The above treaty with Japan was renewed on August 24, 1913, for five years, and again renewed by treaty ratified October 10, 1918, for five years.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to express no opinion on the proposed treaty at this time, but will merely call the attention of the Senate to the fact that these are peace treaties which are now subsisting, and under which there is an agreement for arbitration of all differences between the powers negotiating the treaties as set forth by their terms. The question is, Do we wish to repeal in whole or in part these peace treaties providing for arbitration in the event of differences arising? Does the four-power pact, if ratified, repeal or annul these three treaties with Great Britain, France, and Japan? Do we wish to do away with the present agreements to arbitrate? We recall that we have a Court of International Justice, with an American on it—Mr. John Bassett Moore. However, I have reached no conclusion.

FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent, in connection with this subject, to have inserted in the RECORD, following the treaties I have already asked to have printed, a declaration of principles by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ of America, which has recently been issued. The Federal council represents the Protestant churches of America, numbering, in all, some 20,000,000 people.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the Senator aware that the declaration to which he has referred was laid before the Senate by the Chair this morning?

Mr. McKELLAR. I was not aware of that fact.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not, however, ordered to be printed in full in the RECORD.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not know that it had been presented by the Chair, as I was not present in the Chamber when it was presented. Inasmuch, however, as it has not been ordered printed in the RECORD in full, I now make that request, and that it be printed in the regular RECORD type.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The declaration referred to is as follows:

LOOKING TOWARD A WARLESS WORLD: A DECLARATION, IDEALS, A POLICY, AND A PROGRAM ADOPTED BY THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE, FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA, AT CHICAGO, ILL., DECEMBER 16, 1921.

The executive committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America records on behalf of the churches their solemn and reverent thanksgiving to God for the Conference on Limitation of Armament. In it we recognize His answer to the fervent prayers of millions of Christians throughout this and many other lands. The prophecies of Micah and Isaiah at last begin to receive fulfillment.

We rejoice in the splendid achievements of the conference already assured. They are, however, but the first step toward a warless world. We need to encourage one another and to press forward toward the goal which the Prince of Peace Himself has set before us. With a view to that goal, it is fitting that we should at this time make the following

DECLARATION.

1. We realize that as churches it is not for us to define in detail the political methods and institutions by which the scourge of war shall be ended and the fear of war shall be banished forever from civilized and Christian nations. The determination of such details must be left to diplomats, jurists, and legislators.

2. But we maintain with firm conviction that it is the right and the duty of the church to declare in no doubtful terms the moral principles that are involved in international life, and to insist that our lawmakers, our diplomats, and all those who represent our Nation in its international relations shall observe these principles with utmost care. We insist that the main issue shall not be either evaded or obscured by discussion of details.

3. We hold that the moral principles of international life are the most important of all the so-called "vital interests" of every nation.

4. These "vital interests" are of such importance to the life of churches and nations that every congregation of every church in every land should cooperate for the achievement of a warless world. The World War was won only by international unity of purpose and action. A warless world can be achieved only by like unity of millions of peacemakers.

5. We recognize with deep satisfaction the new spirit of amity and mutual consideration that has sprung up between the nations represented at the conference. This spirit we regard as of greater importance and as giving more hope for the future than any of the specific agreements.

6. The Conference on Limitation of Armament has, indeed, made a good beginning. We deeply rejoice in the agreements for a radical reduction of navies, for the 10-year naval holiday, for the 10-year four-power agreement to maintain peace in the Pacific, and for the steps taken looking toward a real solution of China's pressing problems.

7. But as a Nation we must press on to matters of still greater importance and still more serious difficulty. Capital ships have largely lost their significance. Provision has not yet been made for the general reduction of land armaments. But that which now threatens the world is chemical and airplane and submarine warfare. These new weapons have created new problems for the entire world of the gravest character. How can they be abolished or even limited so long as competitive armaments and war are recognized and permitted as legitimate methods by which civilized peoples may seek to secure national objectives? War itself must be outlawed.

8. We believe that there is one way and only one way to outlaw war. We must first establish a peace system. To take the place of competitive war preparations and recurring wars, we must create the institutions and the agencies of peace. Methods must be found by which to assure full security, equal justice, and fair economic opportunity for all nations and all peoples alike.

9. Mere disarmament by itself alone will not stop war. Only the firm establishment of the institutions of justice and of liberty under law, maintained by effective sanctions at the hands of law-abiding and peace-loving nations, can possibly banish war from this war-cursed world. THE MOST URGENT NEED OF MANKIND TO-DAY IS THE SPEEDY ESTABLISHMENT OF THESE INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTIONS FOR JUSTICE, FOR SECURITY, AND FOR FAIR OPPORTUNITY. THESE ARE ESSENTIAL PREREQUISITES TO PERMANENT PEACE.

10. We believe that peculiar duties and responsibilities rest upon Christians in this and all other lands for the establishment of these institutions. It is for Christian pastors and preachers everywhere to teach these truths to the people, and through the grace of God to create that heart and that will in each nation without which disarmament is only a beautiful rainbow in the sky and a warless world is impossible.

11. We believe that the United States has moral obligations to the nations of Europe. Neither France nor any other nation should ever be exposed to the wrong and the tragedy of invasion. We believe that adequate protection can be given to nations only by effective international guarantees.

In the light of these considerations this Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America adopts for itself and recommends to the churches the following statement of ideals of policy and of progress:

I. INTERNATIONAL IDEALS OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST.

1. We believe that nations no less than individuals are subject to God's immutable moral laws.

2. We believe that nations achieve true welfare, greatness, and honor only through just dealings and unselfish service.

3. We believe that nations that regard themselves as Christian have special international obligations.

4. We believe that the spirit of Christian brotherliness can remove every unjust barrier of trade, color, creed, and race.

5. We believe that Christian patriotism demands the practice of good will between nations.

6. We believe that international policies should secure equal justice for all races.

7. WE BELIEVE THAT ALL NATIONS SHOULD ASSOCIATE THEMSELVES PERMANENTLY FOR WORLD PEACE AND GOOD WILL.

8. We believe in international law and in the universal use of international courts of justice and boards of arbitration.

9. We believe in a sweeping reduction of armaments by all nations.

10. We believe in a warless world and dedicate ourselves to its achievement.

II. THE GENERAL OBLIGATION OF AMERICA TO COOPERATE IN THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A WORLD PEACE SYSTEM.

1. WE BELIEVE THAT THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED STATES SHOULD ASSOCIATE ITSELF PROMPTLY WITH THE OTHER NATIONS OF THE WORLD TO ESTABLISH PERMANENT INSTITUTIONS FOR THE FORMULATION OF INTERNATIONAL LAW, FOR THE EFFECTIVE OPERATION OF THE INTERNATIONAL COURT OF JUSTICE AND OF BOARDS OF ARBITRATION AND CONCILIATION, FOR THE ASSURANCE TO LAW-ABIDING AND PEACE-LOVING NATIONS OF SECURITY FROM ATTACK AND SPOLIATION BY ANY LAWLESS AND AGGRESSIVE NATION, AND FOR THE PROVISION OF FAIR TREATMENT AND EQUAL ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY TO ALL INDIVIDUAL CITIZENS OF LAW-ABIDING AND PEACE-LOVING NATIONS.

2. We believe that only by these institutions and agencies will it be possible and practicable to abolish the menace to the entire human race of submarines, of airplanes, and of poison gasses.

3. We believe, further, that the reconstruction of the shattered institutions of production, of exchange, of trade, and of credit, all so essential to the peace and prosperity of the nations, is possible only when the feverish fears and preparations for possible war are completely abandoned because of the successful functioning of the institutions of an effective world peace system.

4. We take the above stand remembering:

a. THAT PRACTICALLY EVERY IMPORTANT NATION IN THE WORLD HAS COMMITTED ITSELF TO THE IDEA OF A PERMANENT ORGANIZATION OF THE NATION FOR WORLD PEACE, AND MANY OF THEM HAVE ASSOCIATED THEMSELVES IN A LEAGUE OF NATIONS FOR THAT PURPOSE, AND

b. THAT PRESIDENT HARDING HAS REPEATEDLY COMMITTED HIMSELF AND HIS ADMINISTRATION TO A PERMANENT ASSOCIATION OF THE NATIONS FOR WORLD PEACE, RENEWED IN HIS RECENT ADDRESS AT THE OPENING OF THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE IN THE MEMORABLE WORDS THAT THE UNITED STATES COOPERATING WITH OTHER NATIONS, DESIRES "TO DO THAT NOBLER THING WHICH NO NATION CAN DO ALONE."

5. We believe that the time has come for American public opinion to express unmistakably to Congress its emphatic support of President Harding and of the administration in making adequate pledges and in giving satisfactory guarantees that the United States will take its full share of responsibility in international tasks and obligations.

6. We advocate the foregoing policy, remembering the numerous actions of the Federal Council from its very first organization in 1905 and repeated at practically every annual meeting since, urging the creation of a permanent organization of the nations for world peace, which policy has also been repeatedly expressed in numberless actions of our constituent bodies during the last decade.

7. WE REJECT WITH INDIGNATION A POLICY OF TAKING ALL POSSIBLE ECONOMIC ADVANTAGES IN ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD WHILE SHIRKING INTERNATIONAL RESPONSIBILITIES AND OBLIGATIONS.

III. AMERICA'S OBLIGATIONS TO SINGLE NATIONS.

1. To Armenian and Greek Christians:

In view of the tragic conditions of Armenian and Greek Christians under cruel and murderous rulers and of numerous appeals to America for political protection and philanthropic help; and

In view of the proposal in Congress that President Harding take up with Great Britain, France, and Italy the question of dealing effectively with the Turkish maltreatment of Christian subjects.

We urge the churches of America to exert every possible influence—

(1) To secure immediate active measures by our Government for the protection of Christians under Turkish rule;

(2) To provide contributions needful for the physical wants of those threatened with starvation in the Near East; and

(3) To promote a national service of prayer in all our churches until permanent protection is secured for Christians under Turkish rule.

2. To Russia:

Because of the fearful famine in Russia and in response to the appeal of Mr. Hoover, approved by President Harding, we urge the churches and Christians of America to make generous and early response to the pitiful calls from Russia for gifts of food, clothing, and medicine.

This, however, is a case in which private philanthropy is wholly inadequate. We therefore earnestly urge Congress to take the necessary action by which the United States as a Nation may become a good Samaritan.

3. To Austria:

Austria incurred a debt to the United States immediately after the armistice of $24,000,000 for the purchase of food in America. One step immediately pressing for saving Austria from complete dissolution appears to be at least an extension of time for the payment of her international debts. The nations of Europe, except Italy, have consented to a 20-year delay in her debt payments. Italy, also, consents to this delay provided America will do the same.

We therefore urge that our Government unite at once with the other nations for helping Austria by such methods as shall save this suffering nation.

IV. AMERICA'S OBLIGATION TO HER ASSOCIATES IN THE LATE WAR.

In view of the enormous losses of life and property incurred by the nations associated with the United States in the late war, during the period when the United States was preparing to do her part;

And in view of the fact that the sums loaned to them by the United States were expended in this country for food and ammunition by which they were enabled to continue the struggle until America was duly equipped;

We believe that under suitable conditions, each case being handled by itself, the dictates of justice and the principles of economic law require that the United States should consider and adopt some suitable adjustment of these debts of the nations to the United States in order that they shall be as far as possible relieved from their economic difficulties.

V. AMERICA'S OBLIGATIONS TO AID IN THE ECONOMIC RECOVERY OF THE WORLD.

Because of the World War the United States became in a moment of time the most powerful and the richest of all the nations. But power and wealth bring special opportunities and responsibilities. The recovery of economic stability by the nations of the world, and especially by Europe, depends, we are assured, largely on what America does or fails to do.

We therefore ask that the United States unite in an economic conference of the leading nations to do in the realm of industry and finance what has been so well done by the Washington conference in the realm of political understanding and in the reduction of armaments.

VI. AMERICA'S OBLIGATIONS TO GERMANY.

If American Christians are earnest in their desire to have a Christian world order, a peace system to take the place of the old war system, we must ourselves have a Christian spirit toward the peoples of every land.

The Christians and churches of America should enter into the fullest possible fraternal relations with our Christian brethren in Germany, as Christians determined to join in rebuilding our shattered world on new and better foundations.

We recommend, accordingly, that the administrative committee be authorized to prepare a suitable communication to the churches and Christians of Germany on behalf of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, expressing our desire for renewed friendship and cooperation in our common task.

VII. AMERICA'S TREATY OBLIGATIONS.

In international relations nothing is more important than scrupulous observance of treaty obligations.

We insist that the terms of our treaties should be faithfully and honorably observed. If the treaties are not satisfactory, new treaties should be adopted. We condemn all proposals to change or annul existing treaties by mere congressional legislation. These principles should be applied to proposals regarding the use of the Panama Canal, to our dealings with Chinese in the United States, and to all similar questions.

VIII. GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

In view of the splendid proposal of the British Government to solve the Irish question by the magnanimous establishment of a dominion form of government, we recommend that the administrative committee be requested to send as soon as the act has been ratified cablegrams of congratulation to prime minister, Mr. Lloyd-George, and to the official head of the new Irish government.

IX. THE DUTY OF THE CHURCHES.

To carry out effectively the practical international program, sketched in the foregoing sections, we urge:

1. That each constituent body of the Federal council establish its own official committee on international justice and good will for cooperation with this commission of the Federal Council;

2. That each city church federation establish its department of international justice and good will for similar cooperation;

3. That theological schools and seminaries be urged by their denominational authorities to provide adequate courses for their students in international problems and their solutions as essential parts of their theological instruction, and to open special short courses for laymen, equipping them for public work in the new realm of endeavor for establishing the kingdom of God on earth as it is in heaven;

4. That all specialized organizations within or affiliated with the churches be requested earnestly to promote the use of suitable study courses on the kingdom of God in international relations; and

5. That the administrative committee provide in due time for strong committees of American Christians to visit Christian leaders and groups in all lands to set forth the imperative need of international Christian cooperation in the establishment of adequate institutions of peace for the whole world.

Adopted by the executive committee December 16, 1921.

FREDERICK W. BURNHAM,
Chairman.

CHARLES S. MACFARLAND,
General Secretary.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. It ought to have the approval of every Member in the Senate. The law now requires that two bankers shall be members of the board. Then why should agriculture be denied one member of the Federal Reserve Board. During several months past we have felt the need of a farmer on that board. For months and months prior to 1920, before a change came over the spirit of the dreams of the Federal Reserve Board, the board functioned properly, and I wish to say a word of praise for it from the time it was appointed up to 1920. In 1920, however, it failed to function properly; it ceased to be of value to honest banking business in America, and, consciously or unconsciously, became the obedient servant of Wall Street.

Mr. President, in the book of Judges, sixteenth chapter, and seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth verses, the Bible tells us that Samson told Delilah where his strength lay, and that having learned that Delilah sent for the lords of the Philistines, and they came to Delilah with money in their hands. After having betrayed Samson for the money of the Philistines as he slept with his head in her lap Delilah had his head shaved, and his strength went from him.

Samson was a man of marvelous strength—the greatest physical giant of his day. Until betrayed and shorn of his strength he was the pride of his own countrymen and a terror to the enemies of his people.

Prior to 1920 the Federal reserve banking system had exhibited such marvelous strength and had rendered such valuable service that it was generally recognized as the greatest banking institution ever established in the United States.

The business-disturbing and panic-breeding institutions of the country feared and hated it as the lords of the Philistines feared and hated Samson, and in season and out they have tried to deprive it of its power and usefulness. As Samson's strength resided in his hair the directing force and governing power of the Federal reserve banking system resided in the Federal Reserve Board located here in Washington. So long as that board had an eye single to the business needs of the whole country and demanded that those needs be served with the money and credits necessary to keep the body of business strong all was well in the banking and currency business of the United States, but in an evil hour in 1920 the Delilah of Wall Street took the Federal Reserve Board, the head of the Federal reserve banking system, in her lap, and she caused a spell to be thrown upon it while it slept, and when it awoke it did not see or feel as it did before. Just as the lords of the Philistines captured Samson and rendered him harmless to them and impotent to serve his own people the money lords of Wall Street captivated and hypnotized the Federal Reserve Board, and while rendering it useless to the business needs of the people they made it subservient to themselves.

The conduct of the Federal Reserve Board for several months past has been miserable, inexcusable, and indefensible. It has been criticized and condemned by farmers, merchants, and bankers, and others all over the country, and its conduct will go down in the history of this decade as a crime against agriculture, commerce, and honest banking in the United States.

Mr. President, if the bankers of the United States—I mean the country bankers in small towns, the bankers in large towns, and the bankers in many of the cities—knew that this tyrannical Federal Reserve Board would not know what they had said against its conduct, they would draw an indictment against the Federal Reserve Board that would bristle with the complaints, indignations, and grievances of the honest bankers of the country. To-day the Federal Reserve Board holds its foot upon the neck of the grain industry, the cattle industry, and the cotton industry and other industries of the United States, while Wall Street and Chicago look on and applaud. I am in favor of putting in the law this provision now before the Senate which requires the President to appoint a practical farmer as a member of the Federal Reserve Board as soon as another vacancy occurs. The business of agriculture is entitled to this recognition. We demand it. Justice and fair play justify us in demanding it.

When the cattle industry and the cotton industry and the grain industry are in distress and need financial aid and have to call on the Federal reserve banking system, we want a real farmer on the Federal Reserve Board to look after those interests.

Mr. President, in an article contributed to the Paradox—a paper published in the State of Texas, I believe—John Skelton Williams, formerly Comptroller of the Currency, and a man of great ability and of unimpeachable integrity, one who has rendered great service to his country by giving the inside workings of the Federal Reserve Board, says:

> Official reports show that the Federal Reserve Bank of New York was loaning to two banking institutions in New York City, both conspicuous for their speculative operations, more money than all 12 of the Federal reserve banks were ever loaning at any one time on agricultural and live-stock paper in all the 48 States of the Union.

Mr. President, I read that for the purpose of proving that I am correct in saying that this board has become the subservient tool of Wall Street, and that it does not function properly now. It does not meet the needs of the American people. There can be no sound defense of that board's deflation conduct, and I do not know why the President continues to hold it in power.

I have not criticized the President here. I wanted to give him an opportunity to make a good President if it were possible, and I wished him Godspeed, and I have not tried to hamper him. I have criticized this board. I have said that this board ought to be removed. I repeat that assertion to-day; and if the President will not remove it, if the President continues to hold it in power, he must bear the blame and the responsibility for its cruel and criminal conduct.

Mr. President, when a board institutes a policy that destroys the business of thirty-odd millions of people in my section and thirty-odd millions of people in another section of the country—the western section of the United States—it is certainly a criminal act. There is no excuse to-day for cotton selling below the cost of production, except for the deadly policy that this board is pursuing. It has intimidated bankers. Hundreds of bankers are as afraid of it as they are of death. They dare not complain and let the board know it. Why, these people have the whip hand, and the little bankers down the line are tied up to it in a way; and instead of its being the great agency for good that it was for a while, they live in dread and fear of it. That is the institution that you have to-day in control of the banking and currency business of the United States.

Mr. President, those who control the money supply of the people control the business of that people. If they permit money to flow freely and credits to be supplied, there is no reason for any factory being idle, no excuse for any man or woman being unemployed, no excuse for the products of farm or factory or mine selling below the cost of production. Senators, here is where one of the great evils lies, right with this Federal Reserve Board, which has accumulated billions of gold while people out yonder are starving and the business of others is going to ruin.

I was talking on yesterday to an ex-Member of Congress from Ohio, Mr. Crosser. He said: "HEFLIN, I saw a pitiful sight the other night in a theater in Cleveland. They had been advertising for old coats and old clothes for ex-service men"—yes, Mr. President, begging for old clothes for the ex-service men, soldiers who had worn the uniform of their country and offered their lives on the battle line in France, saved our Nation from the dangers that threatened it, saved the liberty and civilization of the world, back home with the richest Government on the globe, with more gold in its possession now than all the rest of the world combined. He said he saw them on the stage in this theater calling for the people to bring up these old coats and old clothes for our ex-service men, and he said they had a stack of them on the stage several feet high, and to see these boys go up and get them touched his heart and made the tears come into his eyes.

Yes, Mr. President, it is enough to make the tears come into your eyes. It is enough to give you a pang in your heart. What does this board care? They are sitting there, drawing big, fat salaries. They are appropriating money, without asking Congress, out of this Federal reserve fund to build a banking palace in Wall Street costing millions and millions of dollars. I am told that one big bronze door cost $25,000. They could have gotten along with a door that cost less than that. If we are going to squander money in that way, I submit that it ought to be appropriated to feed and clothe the men who saved the life of this Nation in the hour of its peril.

I am reminded by my friend from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] that this whole building in New York is to cost about $26,000,000, and that they gave $1,000,000 to the architect. Mr. President, look how easy it is for them just to write checks and dish out this money!

I recited here once before—I will call it to the attention of the Senate again, right in this connection—the case of a young man out in the West, desiring to start a ranch, who borrowed $2,000 from a bank and went out and bought some cattle. He started his ranch and worked with it for a year. He had a few more cattle when the end of the year came than he had when he started. They foreclosed his paper and forced him to pay. He sold the same cattle for $1,300, and it left him owing the bank $700, with his year's work gone and his business destroyed by the bank.

What caused the bank to do that? The Federal Reserve Board undertake to hide out and say: "We are not responsible; the member bank does it"; but that is not true. They are responsible for all of it, because, I tell you, the truth of the situation is this: The member bank, as a rule, will lend money and wants to lend money and will help the local banks in every way they can, but they get word through some mysterious channel, "You had better hold up on this kind of loan, or that, and if you do this or that we will not approve it"; so they live in dread and fear of the Federal Reserve Board, and that feeling has gone all down the line, and it has affected the banking business of the whole country, and our people are suffering from its evil consequences.

Mr. President, one other thing I want to read in this connection to back up my statement that Wall Street is the dominating influence with this Federal Reserve Board which President Harding persists in holding in power. This is also from John Skelton Williams:

> The official figures also show that at one time last year the Federal reserve system was lending to four banking institutions in New York City an aggregate of about $480,000,000. The loans made to four banks in New York amounted to approximately twice as much as the maximum amount loaned at any time during the year 1920 on agricultural and live-stock paper by all 12 Federal reserve banks.

Mr. President, every now and then the governor of the reserve board goes out and makes a speech, and undertakes to explain the actions of the board to the people. He says we do not understand this system, that the board is not responsible, that it is the member bank, that it is the reserve bank, that it is somebody down the line. In response to a question of Congressman BYRNES, of South Carolina, Governor Harding admitted before the Joint Committee on Agriculture of the Senate and the House a year ago this December that no bulletin or order of the general policy of any reserve bank was printed and circulated unless and until it had the approval of the Federal Reserve Board. And that is true. They can not dodge responsibility for the conduct of this system. They control it.

We saw that the Federal reserve banking system was being maladministered, and southern Democrats and western Republicans got together with a few northern Democrats and one or two northern Republicans, and we passed a bill reviving the War Finance Corporation. It looked as if it would do some good, and it has done some good. It seems that the Federal Reserve Board got jealous of the War Finance Corporation, fearing that the cotton farmers would obtain money through it, and that the price of cotton would advance to where it would pay the cost of production and give the farmer a little profit. The other day the Federal Reserve Board gave out an estimate of the cotton crop and broke the price $5 a bale on the day it did it.

Mr. President, what right had the Federal Reserve Board to give out an estimate of the cotton crop? Have we not an Agricultural Department for that purpose? Have we not the Bureau of the Census to take statistics at the cotton gin? What authority has this board to give out an estimate of the crop? It did it and estimated it above what the Agriculture Department estimated it. Was it trying to affect the market injuriously? That is what it did. It broke the price of cotton about $5 a bale. It appears that the board was trying to break the price. Does President Harding indorse that sort of thing?

Mr. President, I mentioned here the other day what I desire to repeat, that out in the Northwest oats are selling for about 17 to 20 cents a bushel. I ordered a saucer of oatmeal this morning and it cost me 15 cents. I ate just a small saucerful.

A Senator sitting near me reminds me that in some places in this city they charge 30 cents for a saucer of oatmeal. Yet the farmer of the West, spending 65 to 67 cents a bushel in producing oats, is driven into the market place by the policy of the Federal Reserve Board, and made to dump all of his produce upon a dead market, where he sells it at less than it cost to produce it, for only 17 cents a bushel. It is some job to carry a bushel of oats on your shoulder, it is a pretty good load, and yet at my breakfast this morning a little saucer full of oatmeal cost me 15 cents. That is the proof of what we are getting under the Republican administration. "And by their fruit ye shall know them."

Think of that, Mr. President; 15 cents for a saucer full of oatmeal. Those men who are fortunate enough to have liquid assets can go to a bank and get all the money they want, but the farmer takes his stuff in and dumps it, and the local banker says, "I want to lend this man something on his crop. He has a thousand bushels of oats, and they are good oats." The Federal Reserve Board says, "Don't lend on agricultural products. He is holding them for speculative purposes."

Of course he is, so that he can get the cost of production plus a profit. Let him go. Drive him to the market. But when the other fellow has the oatmeal in his hand, he says, "I want to get some money."

"What do you want it for?" says the Federal Reserve Board.

"I want to carry on a certain business. What business is that of yours? Here is my paper."

"All right. Let him have it," says the board.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, in the interest of accuracy only, let me suggest that when the Senator from Alabama said that we should know the Republican Party by its fruits, he meant we should know them by their oats.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is right, by the price of oats now. I heard of a case where some fellow like Abe Martin said the other day that "Sam Lomax broke his back shouldering a dollar's worth of Harding oats."

Mr. President, it would take a yoke of steers to pull a dollar's worth of Harding oats or Harding corn now; that would apply to oats, potatoes, corn, and wheat in the great Northwest. Agriculture has died under the withering touch of this Federal Reserve Board's hand, and President Harding can not escape criticism for it and responsibility for it.

The cattle industry of the United States lies prone upon the ground by this policy. The cotton industry of the South is prostrate to-day, and cotton is selling below the cost of production; yet the Federal Reserve Board officers sit back and fan themselves in their comfort and put up a marble temple, a banking institution, in one city costing nearly $30,000,000. What right had they to raise the discount rate from 3 to 7 per cent and accumulate that money—take it away from the poor, struggling industries of the country and hold it, and then dish it out to build a marble banking temple in New York, with its bronze doors costing $25,000 each, and increasing the salaries of that bank's officials? My good friend the able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] told you a little while ago of the enormous increase in those salaries. The poor cotton farmer comes up to the bank with 10 bales of cotton on his wagon and says, "I want to borrow some money."

"What do you want to do with it?" says the banker.

"I want to pay some debts I owe and hold this cotton until the price will cover the cost of production and yield me a profit."

The banker looks at him and says, "John, I would love to let you have the money, but the Federal Reserve Board has sent word down the line not to lend money for speculative purposes; and you are wanting to hold your cotton until it goes up, and they have held that that was for a speculative purpose."

A cattle-industry man comes up and says, "There are my cattle on the plain. I have to buy feed for them. Some of them are my breeding cattle, and I want to borrow some money to settle some debts I have and to hold my cattle and feed them and fatten them so that they will bring more money when the price advances."

"No," he is told, "you are doing that for speculative purposes, and the Federal Reserve Board has whispered the word down the line not to lend money for speculative purposes."

The wheat man and the oat man and the corn man all come up and ask to be relieved, but the Federal Reserve Board's decree has gone forth, and they can not have it. They can sell their oats for 17 cents a bushel, 2 cents more than they charged me for a saucer full of oatmeal on the breakfast table in Washington.

Mr. President, these are facts, and they show an awful condition amongst the farmers of the country. I will give you another result of this board's deadly deflation policy. The board sent out word to the banks not to lend money on cotton produced in 1919. What do you think of that? Suppose I had a Liberty bond that I bought in 1919, and wanted to borrow money on it. Could anybody tell me not to borrow money on it unless it was bought in 1920 or 1921? Suppose I had a note, well secured, given by a party responsible in every way, and I extended the note and carried it from 1919, and wanted to borrow money at the bank and put it up as collateral; if it was good, would anybody refuse to lend me the money because the note was originally made in 1919? He would not if he had any sense of decency and honesty about him. What right had this board to say to the farmers of the South, "You can not borrow money on cotton made in 1919"? There was not much, at best, of the 1919 cotton crop left in the South.

Mr. President, in order to show how ridiculous that position is, suppose a man had a hundred bales of strict middling cotton—white like the snow, whiter than the grades produced in 1920 or 1921, if you please—and he had it stored in a warehouse—nothing had harmed it, it was perfectly dry—and he could not sell it for a price that would cover the cost of production and give him a profit; he held it, and then he goes to a bank in 1921 and says, "I have a hundred bales of cotton, whiter than that cotton you are buying to-day and lending money on, whiter than that you loaned money on last year." They say, "When did you make that cotton?" He says, "I made it in 1919." They answer, "Then, under the policy of the Federal Reserve Board, you can not borrow on it."

Why was that policy inaugurated? To drive these farmers into the market place and make them sell their cotton and dump it on the market, regardless of the price. When they did it, they murdered the cotton industry in the South.

Mr. President, I have said all that I care to say at this time. This is such a serious question I do not intend to let any opportunity pass without bringing it to the attention of the Congress, the President, and the country. I hope that some time he will wake up to a full realization of just what is going on as a result of the destructive policy of the Federal Reserve Board. I do not know who is advising the President, but I know that the President must take the responsibility. He must bear it. We are entitled to lay it at his door. Speeches have been made in this body time and time again, and some in the other branch of Congress, in criticism of the board. Nobody has ever defended the conduct of this board; nobody can defend it. Of course, I suppose there will be some of the friends of the board who will indorse its policy, and they will, of course, be conscientious in their views, but they do not know the situation. I am sure if they did they would join with us in criticising and condemning the conduct of the board.

Until the scales fell from his eyes, Paul persecuted Christ. Now, it may be that there are some Senators who have never had the scales to fall from their eyes, who will rise and defend the Federal Reserve Board, and will continue to persecute the masses of the American people who are crying out in their distress for deliverance from this body of death that the Federal Reserve Board has fastened upon them. The South cries out in protest against this policy, the West cries out in protest against it, but Wall Street approves and applauds it. I call upon the President of the people of these United States to give us deliverance from the curse of this egotistical and tyrannical Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, the pending amendment in no way deals with the question of policy or control of policy of the Federal Reserve Board, and I have no intention of discussing that. The board has been under the control of representatives of the Democratic Party for some time, and I believe is still under the control of a majority of representatives of that party. But the particular bill before the Senate——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just at that point?

Mr. EDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator did not hear me state a moment ago that I had read on the floor of the Senate from the Washington Times an article printed in April last, saying that Gov. Harding would remain at the head of the board and had supported the Republican Party last fall.

Mr. EDGE. As I stated in the outset, I have no intention of discussing the policy of the board. The bill under consideration is a bill dealing with an entirely different subject, and I think we could make more headway in the Senate if we would confine our discussion—and I say this without any attempt to criticize the Senator from Alabama particularly—to the business actually before the Senate.

I am opposed to the suggested amendment because, in my judgment, it establishes a very dangerous policy, a policy of dictating by statute the type of business a man must be engaged in to make him eligible for executive appointment. I think the limitation of legislation, generally speaking, should be the establishment of general policies, the extent to which public bodies will be permitted to go in the jurisdiction of their activities, and then leave to the Executive, who is selected by the people, the responsibility of making appointments in his judgment fitting that particular activity.

I suppose it will be said by those who support the amendment that the existing law provides for two members of a particular profession, so therefore why is it inconsistent for the proponents of the amendment to provide for the inclusion of a representative of the agricultural industry? I do not think that position can be successfully defended or maintained, because the language of the existing act—and I believe the language of the amendment is a copy of the existing act—so far as it refers to representatives of the banking profession, reads as follows:

> Of the five members thus appointed by the President at least two shall be persons experienced in banking or finance.

Then it goes on as proposed by the pending amendment:

> And one shall be a person whose business and occupation is farming.

There is a distinct difference in my judgment between a description of eligibility which provides that they must be experienced in banking or finance, and a provision which reads that they shall be engaged in the actual business and occupation of farming.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator, for the purpose of his argument, that the amendment was changed, as I understand, so that it now reads "experienced in and whose business and occupation is farming." It goes a little further than the present act in its description of bankers, but it does add the words "experienced in." The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] modified his amendment to that extent.

Mr. EDGE. I am reading from the amendment which I supposed had in no way been changed.

Mr. KENYON. It was changed just this afternoon.

Mr. EDGE. The language as now contained in the existing law, however, as I call it to the attention of the Senator from Iowa, so far as it refers to the eligibility of those experienced in banking and finance, is not changed by the pending amendment.

Mr. KENYON. No; it is not.

Mr. EDGE. To that I wish to address myself particularly. It would seem to me to be entirely consistent and businesslike to propose, as the present act does, that a minority of the board dealing with the finances of the country should at least be experienced in the particular responsibility with which the board is supposed to deal.

I can not see where any reasonable criticism could be directed to the provision that two of the five shall have knowledge and experience in finance and banking, when we realize, as we of course do, that in the jurisdiction of this board is the control, to a great extent, of the entire financial structure of the country.

However, so far as I am concerned and from my viewpoint I would just as soon see that semieligibility provision taken out of the existing law. I am entirely ready to leave to the Executive of the country and hold him responsible for the selection of men to assume any particular line of responsibility. So far as that being used as a reason for the insertion of this mandatory provision, I can not see where the cases are parallel, or why the insistence that a minority shall have experience in banking matters is any reason why we should suddenly say that there shall be one directly experienced and engaged in the occupation of farming. It is not a farming responsibility any more than it is an industrial responsibility, any more than it is a commercial responsibility, or any more than it is a responsibility which in finance naturally covers every activity of the country.

I am entirely satisfied that all five men shall be experienced in farming or any number of the five experienced in farming, but I see no more reason why we should insert in the bill that one shall be engaged in farming any more than we should say that one must be engaged in manufacturing, one must be engaged as a leader of organized labor, or one must be engaged in some other activity. That the law should contain a provision that two should be experienced in banking seems to me to be a rather sensible provision, but as I said I do not think even that is absolutely necessary, as I am sure the President can be trusted to make suitable appointments, and if not the Senate always has the power to refuse to confirm.

I am afraid, and I do not wish to be misunderstood, that this type of legislation is going to lead us into a position which will be very unfortunate in its final analysis. Any type of legislation which picks out any particular class of citizen and says that he must be in this or that position, without regard for the many other classes of citizens, it seems to me is unwise legislation.

So far as the policy of the board is concerned, at which most of the debate seems to have been directed, of course the passage of the bill, even if amended by the proposed amendment, would have no material effect. The bill provides, as I understand it, reading it hurriedly, for the appointment, on the occasion of the next vacancy, of this man who has had experience and is engaged in farming. That would mean one member particularly qualified, so far as the judgment of the Executive is concerned, in the business of farming. It would have no material effect, only so far as one member's responsibility and policy might be concerned, on the policy of the board.

If the policy of the board is incorrect, if they are spending too much money in building large banking houses in New York, if in any other way their policy of deflation or otherwise is against the interests of the country, agriculturally or otherwise, let us establish that and have legislation properly touching upon it. But the pending bill refers alone to the eligibility of a future appointee to the Federal Reserve Board and proposes to select one class as against every other class of citizenship in the country.

May I repeat that I thoroughly appreciate the great struggle which the agricultural interests of the country have had. I thoroughly appreciate the situation existing to-day in the Middle West and in the Northwest, as I have followed the discussion of Senators here and have followed the general information available to us. I sympathize with them in any practical way that the Senate or Congress can assist or help them, and believe it is our duty to do it. But I do not believe we are going to materially help them by suddenly departing from a broad policy and advising the Executive that a representative of a certain great industry—and it is a great industry—in this country shall be named to membership on the financial board of the country.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. EDGE. Certainly.

Mr. SPENCER. Is the Senator in sympathy with the present wording of the bill that in making these appointments the President shall have in mind the commercial, the industrial, and the geographical divisions of the country?

Mr. EDGE. Entirely so.

Mr. SPENCER. If the Senator is in sympathy with the present language of the bill that the commercial activities of the country and the industrial activities of the country should be held in mind in making the appointments, for what reason would the Senator eliminate the agricultural interests of the country?

Mr. EDGE. I think the Senator misunderstands the bill now before us. The bill reported by the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency provides, as I understand, for the inclusion of the word "agricultural" before the words "commercial, industrial, and geographical divisions," with which I am in entire sympathy and accord, and which bill I would vote for with great pleasure; but an amendment has been offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], which is now pending, which takes up and includes the mandatory provision I have been discussing.

Mr. SPENCER. In other words, I understand the Senator to be in entire sympathy with the inclusion of the agricultural activities of the Nation as well as the commercial and the industrial activities?

Mr. EDGE. Entirely so for consideration when making these appointments. I thank the Senator very much for calling my attention to the possible misunderstanding of my remarks if this had not been brought to the attention of the Senate. The bill as reported by the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency adding the word "agriculture" before the word "commercial" is one with which I am in entire sympathy and think that it would be an additional understanding to the Executive from Congress that the agricultural interests should be taken into consideration in making up his appointments to this board, but not that he must appoint a farmer regardless of other interests. We do not compel him to directly recognize any other activity.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment and ask that it be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be reported.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 3, after line 14, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

The Federal Reserve Board shall have no authority hereafter to enter into any contract or contracts for the erection of any building of any kind or character, or to authorize the erection of any building, without the consent of Congress having previously been given therefor in express terms.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, the bill now under discussion was referred to a subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency, consisting of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. Hearings were had. The substitute bill recommended provides that in selecting the members of the Federal Reserve Board the President shall have due regard to a fair representation of the different agricultural, commercial, industrial, and geographical divisions of the country. The original bill was drawn by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. That bill increased the number of members of the Reserve Board from seven to eight, and provided that the additional member should be a representative of the agricultural interests.

The bill as reported by the committee was, as I understood, satisfactory to the agricultural bloc or the Senators who claim to represent the agricultural interests of the country. I regret that no member of the subcommittee is present, as I could not attend the hearings, being occupied in the Committee on Finance. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa, who apparently is now in charge of the bill, if he desires the bill as it was reported from the committee to pass, or whether he is in sympathy with the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]?

Mr. KENYON. I wish, first, to say that I am not in charge of the bill. I gave notice that I would move to take up the bill. I thought it ought to be considered. As the Senator from Connecticut remembers, I introduced a bill and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] also introduced a bill in reference to this matter. Both of those bills went to the Committee on Banking and Currency. We tried to get the committee to act—I am not criticizing the committee—and suggestions were made along the line of the bill which the Senator has reported from his committee. The bill was never satisfactory to me; but it was better than nothing, I will say. I prefer it to no change in the law at all; but I very much prefer the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. McLEAN. That being the case, Mr. President, the author of the bill being absent, and the Senator from Iowa being in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, I regret that some member of the subcommittee which had the bill in charge is not present at this time, for I wish to say to the Senator from Iowa that the equivalent of the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina was considered by the committee and was rejected, as the pending bill indicates.

Mr. KENYON. I have no doubt that the committee would be against the proposition involved in the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina, but, of course, that does not prevent the Senate from having a chance to adopt it.

Mr. McLEAN. No; but I understand the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is opposed to this amendment, as is the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE]. In fact, Mr. President, I do not see any member of the Committee on Banking and Currency present in the Chamber to-day except myself, the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I have no disposition to postpone action upon the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Connecticut will permit me, I should like to understand the parliamentary situation. As I understand, the Committee on Banking and Currency have reported an amendment which proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert a new bill. I understand that the Senator from South Carolina has offered an amendment. Is the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina a substitute for the committee amendment? Does he propose to strike the bill out entirely and to insert new matter?

Mr. McLEAN. No; I understand his amendment is to the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Where does the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina come in the amendment of the committee?

Mr. HEFLIN. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to say I understood the Senator from South Carolina to say that his amendment was intended as a substitute, but the Senator from South Carolina was called from the Chamber just a moment ago.

Mr. NORRIS. If the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina is not a substitute for the amendment of the committee, I wish the Senator would tell me, or perhaps I might be informed by the Chair, just where the amendment comes in?

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from South Carolina offered his amendment as a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from South Carolina is a substitute.

Mr. NORRIS. Now the Senator from Georgia offers an amendment?

Mr. KENYON. No.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator offered an amendment. I did not understand the Chair to hold it not to be in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia has precedence over the other amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to know—I could not understand from the reading of the Senator's amendment—where the amendment comes in. As the Secretary read the amendment, it read, as I heard it, "at the end of line 14, on page 3," and there is not any such line.

Mr. HARRIS. After line 13.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia is simply an addition to the committee amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not the floor, but if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] is through I wish to support the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. McLEAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. But suppose the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina were adopted?

Mr. HARRIS. Then I shall ask that my amendment be added to his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Should the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina be adopted that would not prevent the Senator from Georgia from reoffering his amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. That makes the parliamentary situation clearer; and that is what I wanted to know.

While I did not intend to say anything on the bill, since the Senator from Connecticut has yielded, and I seem to have the floor without actually wanting it, I would like to say——

Mr. McLEAN. I am perfectly willing to surrender the floor at this time, although I had not finished what I desired to say.

Mr. HEFLIN. I see that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has returned to the Chamber.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. McLEAN. I am perfectly willing to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I rose for the purpose of getting the parliamentary situation clear. I will now withdraw and permit the Senator from Connecticut to conclude his remarks.

Mr. McLEAN. I was out of the Chamber when the Senator from Georgia offered his amendment. I should therefore like to have it again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] proposes to perfect the committee amendment by adding, on page 3 of the bill as reported, after line 13, the following language:

The Federal Reserve Board shall have no authority to enter into any contract or contracts for the erection of any building of any kind or character or to authorize the erection of any building without the consent of Congress having previously been given therefor in express terms.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, it is my opinion that before the Senate acts on that amendment the existing conditions should be inquired into. Very serious consequences might result, if seems to me, if any other course were followed. I have no objection to the question being considered in connection with this bill; but if it is to be considered, I do not think that a vote ought to be asked on the amendment without further information, because my impression is that some of these buildings are under process of construction. For the Congress at this time to lay an inhibition upon work now being done might involve serious consequences, and it seems to me the Senate ought to know the facts before they vote either for or against the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield, in order that I may ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Can the Senator from Georgia give the Senate the information suggested by the Senator from Connecticut? Does the Senator from Georgia know how many buildings are already in process of construction? I am told, for instance, that there is one being constructed in Atlanta, another in Richmond, and perhaps there are other buildings already contracted for and now under process of construction. The amendment might interfere with the completion of those buildings. So I think we ought to have more information respecting the subject. I agree with the general principle of the amendment, that Congress ought to appropriate for public buildings; that it ought to have an opportunity to grant the sums necessary or to refuse to do so.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the amendment is not intended to apply to buildings now being constructed. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] read to-day a statement showing the waste and extravagance of the Federal Reserve Board in the erection of buildings. The amendment is simply designed to prevent that condition arising in the future.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am not sure that the last statement of the Senator from Georgia is correct. I do not mean, of course, to impugn his motive in making the statement; all I mean to say is that I think his amendment might go further than he intends that it shall go.

Mr. HARRIS. I can add the words "hereafter" to the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask that the amendment be again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment of the committee, it is proposed to add the following:

The Federal Reserve Board shall have no authority to enter into any contract or contracts for the erection of any building of any kind or character or to authorize the erection of any building without the consent of Congress having previously been given therefor in express terms.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not think that the amendment as drawn would necessarily be limited to contracts hereafter made. I recall that an act of Congress in which almost the identical, or, at least analogous, language was used respecting the jurisdiction of a certain court; it was stated that the court would have no jurisdiction to consider certain classes of cases; but upon construction of that act it was held that the court had no jurisdiction to determine the cases that were then pending before the court. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] is, I think, familiar with that subject, and will recall the construction placed upon the measure to which I have referred. So if that course were followed, under such an amendment as that proposed by the Senator from Georgia, it would apply to buildings heretofore authorized.

Mr. HARRIS. I will ask the Senator from Arkansas if adding the word "hereafter" would not meet the objection which he raises?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think so.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I ask that the word "hereafter" be inserted in the amendment. I modify the amendment in that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The modification will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. After the word "authority" it is proposed to insert the word "hereafter."

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, does the Senator from Georgia know just what authority the members of the Federal Reserve Board have over these contracts?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know what authority they have, but I know what they have been doing, and I think they ought to have the consent of Congress before engaging in the construction of buildings costing millions of dollars.

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator not think we ought to know just what their jurisdiction over the matter is under the law before we proceed to regulate them?

Mr. HARRIS. I think the Members of the Senate understand what authority they have and how they have been abusing it. The amendment is designed to correct the abuse which has apparently crept in.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator from Connecticut, this idea suggested itself to me on the second reading of the amendment. It refers specifically to the Federal Reserve Board. I am inclined to think that what the Senator wants to reach—I know it is what I should like to reach—is not so much the Federal Reserve Board as perhaps the various regional banks. I presume, taking the Federal reserve bank at New York City, for instance, that the Federal Reserve Board has nothing to do with it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, yes; they have to approve of whatever is done.

Mr. NORRIS. Then it is all right.

Mr. HARRIS. That is my understanding.

Mr. OVERMAN. The existing law says "with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board."

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to prevent the erection of any of these buildings without the consent of Congress if I could, and if the amendment is not worded properly it ought to be changed, so that it would carry out the intent which we have in mind.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is an important matter, and that we ought to act intelligently upon it, notwithstanding it is claimed to be in the interest of the farmer; and I will ask the Senator from Iowa if there is any objection to postponing action upon it until to-morrow. I think the Senator from Virginia will very likely be here then, and the Senator from New Jersey was chairman of the subcommittee which had charge of this bill.

Mr. KENYON. Is it because of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; I think we ought to inquire into that.

Mr. KENYON. I think it should be inquired into, too. I had hoped that we could finish the bill this afternoon, because the bill of which the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has charge, with reference to Russian relief, he wants to bring up to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, suppose I make this suggestion:

The substitute offered by me, to place a farmer on this board, is extremely simple. Everyone knows that we are trying, in a way, to laymanize this board. I have here the list of those who now constitute the board, showing their vocations or professions, and I do not think any man could reasonably object to the appointment by the President of a man whose experience and whose business is farming, who can be gotten with the necessary qualifications to sit on this board on a question so vital to the whole industrial and commercial fabric of our Government. I do not think any serious objection could be raised, unless we hold to the old idea that the banking business must be turned over purely and simply to those whose investments are in banking and whose interest comes out of banking.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia deals with a matter that I have not studied in reference to the law. I do not recall now whether or not the statute gives the Federal Reserve Board the right to control the activities of a regional bank.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, let me read from this report which has been sent to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. I shall be very glad to have that done.

Mr. OVERMAN [reading]:

It is also provided in section 4 that "any compensation that may be provided by boards of directors of Federal reserve banks for directors, officers, or employees shall be subject to the approval of the Federal Reserve Board."

That is as to compensation for officers and employees. It does not say anything about contracts.

Mr. SMITH. Under the general terms of the bill, these regional banks are not allowed to earn more than 6 per cent on the capital invested in the bank. Of course, if the volume of their business is so great that they have a surplus under the 6 per cent, it would be a fair inference that they have money of their own earning. The dividend is to be confined to 6 per cent on the capital invested. If they have increased their investment so greatly that the 6 per cent warranted them in spending $17,000,000 to build a home for the regional bank in New York, that would come out in the investigation; but I do not recall any specific authority given the Federal Reserve Board to determine the manner in which they should spend that 6 per cent. I am quite sure, however, that the officers of regional banks have no authority under this act to spend the money of the regional banks other than the 6 per cent that they are given under the law. The law provides what disposition they shall make of the balance of it.

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know whether they are using their profits improperly or not, and it seems to me we ought to ascertain that fact.

Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina will pardon me, I should like now very briefly to call attention to some of the objections that were raised to his amendment—that is, his proposal that we limit the discretion of the Executive in selecting the membership of this board to a particular class or interest.

The Senator will see that the amendment as reported by the committee gives ample discretion to the President to put on five farmers if he wishes to do so.

Mr. SMITH. But it also gives him discretion to leave them all off, if he wishes to do so.

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; he can leave them all off.

Mr. SMITH. I want to test whether or not it is the sense of the Senate that they will give any one man power to determine the financial policy of this country. That is exactly the point.

Mr. McLEAN. That is the question, and it seems to me to be a very serious question, the policy suggested by the Senator from South Carolina. I dislike very much to oppose his amendment, because I know that he is deeply interested in legislation that is beneficial to the agricultural interests of the country, and I think I am. I feel that we ought to do all that we can to really help the farmer. I think we have done a great deal.

Mr. SMITH. Let me ask the Senator a question. This is not captious: Does not the Senator think the farmer has done quite a good deal to help the country?

Mr. McLEAN. Does the Senator think it is necessary for me to answer that question?

Mr. SMITH. I do, from the nature of the Senator's tone.

Mr. McLEAN. I think I own as much poor land as any man in this Senate. I think I have had as much experience with the drudgery of farming as any man in the Senate. I want the Senator to know that I was born and brought up on a farm, and now cultivate the farm on which I was born. I think I know as much about the hardships of the farmer as the Senator does, and my sympathies are with him; but I do not believe in surrendering a vital principle, which is involved in the Senator's amendment, to a mere political maneuver that means nothing.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I am not going to allow that statement to go unchallenged—"a political maneuver."

Mr. McLEAN. That means nothing.

Mr. SMITH. "That means nothing."

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. That shows the Senator's estimate as to whether this matter of governing the great credit of the country and the finances of this country shall be controlled by us or left to one individual.

Now, listen! In your original law, as it now stands, unamended, you provided, and perhaps correctly, that at least two of these men shall be men experienced in banking and finance. Nobody challenged that, because it was a banking proposition to start with; but it is not a proposition for the interest alone of the bankers of the country, and the Senator knows enough about human nature to know that a man is going to be biased by the business he is engaged in. Therefore, when you get a buyer and a seller——

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator does not propose to have me answer——

Mr. McLEAN. I get the idea of the Senator's reply. It does not seem to me that it has any bearing on the real question.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, nothing has any bearing on this sacred thing that is dedicated to the bankers of this country, and anybody who puts his hands on it is violating the holy of holies.

Mr. McLEAN. No; there are thousands of farmers who are qualified for membership on the Federal Reserve Board. There is no question about that. By the same token—to use an expression frequently uttered by the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]—all that the worst pirate in Wall Street need do to qualify under the Senator's amendment is to buy a 10-acre farm and a cow and a few chickens.

Mr. SMITH. No; it is not. Under the amended amendment, as I amended it this morning, he must be a man who is experienced in and whose business and occupation is farming.

Mr. McLEAN. He would be experienced in farming, and rapidly so, if he had a 10-acre farm and tried to get anything in return. I do not want to do an absurd thing, a thing that is offensive to sound policy and means nothing.

Mr. SMITH. Measured by what?

Mr. McLEAN. Measured by experience and common sense. The bill as reported by the committee covers all the ground.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, to be sure. It is one of those glittering generalities that do not mean a thing.

Mr. McLEAN. The President can put five farmers on the board now if he wants to. Let me again call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that Mr. Miller, of California, is an economist. He also has a very large farm, and is a scientific farmer.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I guess he is a scientific farmer.

Mr. McLEAN. He is already a member of the board. Mr. Hamlin, of Massachusetts, I think is a lawyer by profession.

Mr. SMITH. Very likely.

Mr. McLEAN. He owns a farm, and, as I understand, is a very scientific farmer.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I guess he is.

Mr. McLEAN. So you have two members on the board now who qualify under your proposed law; and it seems to me to be absurd to limit the President in his selection in the future to a farmer. Now, let us assume that we have no farmer on the board to-day.

Mr. SMITH. Which is a very wise assumption.

Mr. McLEAN. And the President appoints one, and he dies or resigns, or his term of office expires. That vacancy may occur at a time when the best-qualified man in the country, recognized as such, would be available for that position; and yet, under the law as the Senator proposes to amend it, the President can not appoint him.

Mr. SMITH. Precisely.

Mr. McLEAN. Under the Senator's amendment the President can not appoint him, because he has to appoint a farmer.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to ascertain who has the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Connecticut to have the floor.

Mr. SMITH. Very well. I supposed I had it. I will wait until I have the floor in my own right to answer.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield just for a question?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator from South Carolina, in questioning the Senator from Connecticut, drew attention to the fact that the present act already provides that two members of the board shall be experienced in banking or finance.

The Senator from South Carolina was not in the Chamber when I referred to that. However, his amendment is distinctly different, because it provides, in his own language as amended this morning, that the additional member or the member referred to in his amendment shall be a person experienced in and whose business and occupation is farming.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDGE. In other words, he must be actively engaged in the business of farming.

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDGE. The existing act, to which reference was made by the Senator from South Carolina as already recognizing the banking business, only recognizes it from the standpoint of qualification, which I do not think the Senator for one moment would question.

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. EDGE. He does not contend for a moment that the member must be an active banker at the present time or at the time when appointed.

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. EDGE. So that the departure provided by the Senator from South Carolina is a distinct one——

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. And for the first time its picks out a person belonging to this one class alone to be always a member of the Federal Reserve Board. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator from Connecticut will allow me to reply to the Senator from New Jersey, the Senator from New Jersey would not question for a moment that with that qualification there the President would appoint under that language a man who was in the banking business and who knew finance. As evidence of that fact, I am informed that Mr. Crissinger is a lawyer and a banker.

Mr. Mellon is known as a banker. I will call off the names here: Mr. Harding was a banker; Mr. Platt was a banker.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon. Mr. Platt never was in the banking business in his life. He was chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives. If that qualified him, then he was a banker.

Mr. SMITH. This list was furnished to me. What is his profession?

Mr. CALDER. He is a journalist.

Mr. SMITH. All right; he is a journalist. Mr. Miller is a professor of economics. Mr. Hamlin is an attorney, and, I have been informed, invests and has some banking interests. Mr. Mitchell is a banker. So that we have five out-and-out bankers, and the vocation or profession of the others is rather nondescript.

But, understand me, I am not trying to draw the comparison between what is there and what is not. I in concert with others think it the duty of this Government to put on the board who are to pass upon the credits and finances of this country a man from that class which bears the burden of producing the great essentials of life from the field, and we are to have a vote on the simple question of having on the board of governors of our great financial institution one who has been engaged in producing the necessaries of life, a farmer, who can sanely and wisely pass on measures affecting the entire country when they come before the board. That is what we propose to do, and you can appoint Mr. Hamlin or Mr. Somebody Else as much as you please, but as we have to confirm him, I take it that if the President appoints him the Senate, if this amendment passes, will scrutinize the man's record to discover whether or not he is a farmer or whether he farms the farmer.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I want to reply briefly to the Senator from South Carolina. I understand what the Senator's purpose is—if the amendment which he has offered has any purpose—to oblige the Executive to put upon this board an agent, an advocate, a representative, of a special interest, to take care of that interest. Is not that right?

Mr. SMITH. Yes. The special interest known as the farming interest, if you call that a special interest, if you want to distort words and twist them around to make it appear that I am taking out some special little protected class, when this building and the prosperity of the people of this country rest upon that one class alone.

Mr. McLEAN. The purpose of this amendment, if it has any purpose, is to compel the Executive to put upon that board an agent of a special interest.

Mr. SMITH. A representative. You can denominate it with adjectives and with substantives as you please, but it is a representative of that class we want appointed.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator expects that this appointee, whoever he may be, will act in the interests of the farmers, the agricultural interests.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. McLEAN. As their agent in securing proper accommodations from the banking system of the country.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; that is my purpose.

Mr. McLEAN. To-morrow somebody may ask that the President be directed to put on the board an agent of the transportation interests or of the manufacturing interests. Organized labor may consider that they are vitally concerned in this matter and ask that they have an agent. Then what would you have? Instead of an unprejudiced board appointed by reason of its training and natural abilities to care for these great financial interests you would have agents of four or five different classes of interests, which are bound to clash and bring disaster to the whole credit structure of this country. If you follow that policy to its logical conclusion that is what will happen. I say to the Senator from South Carolina that there is no governmental function in the performance of which mistakes can be more easily made, and be more disastrous if made, than in the control of the credit merchants of this country.

Mr. SMITH. We are suffering from such mistakes now, and that is what I am trying to correct.

Mr. McLEAN. No; the Senator wants to turn this control over to agents of special interests. The Senator is complaining that we have not governmental interference enough.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no.

Mr. McLEAN. And he wants Congress to enact still more and other varieties of restrictive legislation. I want the Senator from South Carolina to remember that a banker is dealing with other people's money and he is under a solemn and sacred obligation to be able to return that money to its owner on demand, and when you set up a Federal Reserve Board representing special interests with the idea that you can by law compel a banker to lend money at a lower rate of interest and under less safe security to one class than he will lend to another class you are facing disaster. That is my point.

Mr. SMITH. As soon as the Senator has concluded, I will have something to say. I just want to say now, so as to keep the connection on the record, that the Senator declares the banker is under a solemn obligation to take care of the money intrusted to him. If we appoint a farmer on this banking institution, would he not be under the very same obligation, and has he not the same capacity to meet it that the banker has?

Mr. McLEAN. He might have, not because he is a farmer but because of his training, his experience, and his learning in finance and the principles of economics. Unless he has such qualifications, he can not avoid crossing the dead line and making mistakes which may be disastrous to his own friends, even though he has the best of intentions.

Mr. SMITH. Does not the Senator think there are farmers in this country qualified to be members of the board?

Mr. McLEAN. Certainly I do, but they are not qualified because they are farmers.

Mr. SMITH. I want a farmer on the board because he is a farmer and understands the peculiar circumstances under which farming must be financed, and that can be done without robbing anybody and without bringing on a crisis when there is a boasted $3,000,000,000 gold reserve.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator knows very well that under the bill reported by the committee the Executive can choose a man who is experienced in agriculture and who at the same time has had the education and training which he must have to perform his duties as a member of the Federal Reserve Board. We do not put farmers or doctors or merchants on the Supreme Court of the United States. It is constituted of lawyers, because we know that it is only from that profession that we can get men who are learned in the law, and we choose them because of their preeminent qualifications, both in integrity and in knowledge of the law. So the members of the Federal Reserve Board may be farmers, they may be doctors, they may be lawyers; but my point is, in addition to whatever else they may know, they should have the qualifications which I have mentioned, and under the bill as reported by the committee the President has ample discretion; but under the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, as I have before suggested, if a man were in collusion with the Executive, all that he would need do to qualify would be to buy a little farm and put a cow and a few chickens on it and the law would be complied with.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire, in connection with the questions which have been asked by the Senator from South Carolina, to ask the Senator from Connecticut another question along the same line.

Mr. McLEAN. The Senator from Tennessee will have to wait a few minutes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. McLEAN. As I have said, this matter was gone into before the subcommittee. I have not had an opportunity to examine the testimony taken, and I regret that some members of the subcommittee are not here; but I find on page 30 of the printed hearings Senator GLASS's views, which I will quote:

> I dislike so much to be seemingly classified as among those who are hostile to the farming interests. As a matter of fact, the Federal reserve law is altogether partial to the farmers. You and I happen to be a manufacturer or a merchant, and the duration of our credit is limited to 90 days. We can not get a rediscount on our paper of more than 90 days. The farmer can get a rediscount of six months. As it were, he is God's chosen people under the text and terms of the Federal reserve act.
> I must confess that it irritates me when gentlemen get up on the floor of either House of Congress and try to make it appear that the poor farmer has been discriminated against. Under the Federal reserve banking system it is not a fact.

On this same page I find the following statement made by Senator KELLOGG, the author of this bill:

> I took pains last fall to inquire on a certain day in October what the condition of the Federal reserve, the city banks and the country banks, in my State was, and I found that the loans to country banks in St. Paul and Minneapolis on that day, in last October, I don't remember the exact date, were forty millions more than the year previous. The deposits in the city banks from the country banks was $35,000,000 less. That is for two cities in my State.

There is a total preference of over $75,000,000. I happen to have in my hand a letter from Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, dated December 19, in which he offers a suggestion or two with regard to this bill. I quote:

It may interest you to know that the board recently appointed as class "C" director of the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City Mr. Herer Hord, of Central City, Nebr., who is a grain merchant and in addition a large farmer and cattle raiser, owning lands both in western Nebraska and in Wyoming. The member banks of the Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco, which constitute group 2, have just elected as class "B" director Mr. William T. Sesnon, who is a raisin vineyardist in Fresno County and who owns lands as described in the inclosed memorandum.

* * * * * * *

If anyone would take the trouble to look at the statements which are made week by week by all Federal reserve banks they would see that the farmer has not been discriminated against, but, on the contrary, member banks which cater to farming interests have been granted very large lines of credit; more, in fact, in many cases than would seem to be warranted by good banking practice. If there are any who feel that the farmer has been discriminated against, however, their remedy would seem to me to lie in the election of directors of Federal reserve banks, for the Federal Reserve Board has nothing to do with passing on the paper which is offered Federal reserve banks for rediscount. This is done entirely by the directors of the Federal reserve banks and their authorized officers and employees.

I think no one will dispute that interpretation of the law, and if it be correct, it must be apparent to every candid man that the object of the Senator from South Carolina will not be attained, if he succeeds in securing the adoption of this amendment, as I have no doubt he will.

Mr. President, as I said a few minutes ago, I think this is an important matter, and it does not seem to me that the Senate ought to vote upon it without understanding the principle involved. There is no disposition on the part of anyone to curb the Executive in exercising a choice, if he wishes to, in favor of the agricultural interests. The amendment proposed by the committee covers all the ground that can be safely covered without involving the violation of a very vital principle, and I regret that the gentlemen who represent the agricultural interests should feel inclined to press this experiment in politics, because I am certain in the course of time it will return to plague them, and the immediate advantage will be nil.

Mr. President, most of our farmers cut their eyeteeth before they are 21, and they are not as easily fooled as some may imagine. When we do something for the farmer I think that we had better not try to deceive him, and he will receive no benefit whatever under the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina.

I wish to quote again from Senator GLASS's remarks at the time of the hearing:

Senator GLASS. But does anybody here imagine that the Federal Reserve Board makes loans, that the Federal Reserve Board extends the farmer credit? These credits are extended by the individual banks in their individual communities, by men who know the requirements of the particular territory and the men who live in them. The Federal Reserve Board here at Washington just has observation and administration of the general policy of the system. They do not extend any credits.

The CHAIRMAN. But, Senator, this is what I mean: For instance, take a man who is prominent—we will say a man like Wallace, who is not only a farmer and who has a knowledge of farming but is a man of some position and some accumulation of wealth, we will say—can not he bring to the Federal Reserve Board a knowledge of conditions? For instance, you take the live-stock situation, would he not be informed of it, and could he not present it a great deal better than the average banker who came from either New England or some other section of the country where he was not familiar with it? That is the point.

Senator GLASS. He does not need to be a member of the Federal Reserve Board to present it as a practical view. That situation was presented to the Congress of the United States, and Congress did an unprecedented thing. What it did for the cattle people of this country has never been done since the foundation of the Government to any other interest. It authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit the people's money in these farm banks for the particular advantage and benefit of the cattle feeders and growers of this country—on what? On security that would be required of you as a manufacturer or me as a merchant or somebody else in some other avocation? No. Upon their own I O U's, upon their own certificates of indebtedness, a thing never done for any other interest before in the United States.

I do not think anyone will dispute these views of the distinguished Senator from Virginia. It seems to me that the remarks of the Senator from Alabama are not deserved by this great banking system. It may have its faults, but I think it should be fairly treated by Congress, because of the most unfortunate consequences which may result if we undertake to enact restrictive legislation that will in any way circumscribe the full beneficial operation of the system. It can easily be done.

I received a letter only this morning from the chairman of the American Bankers' Association, in which he said that many of the member banks of the system are retiring and organizing under State laws because of their fear of governmental meddling.

I think there is foundation for that statement. I am not familiar with recent statistics with regard to the number of banks, whether they have increased or diminished, but Senators can easily see that unless we use good judgment in this matter we are seriously curtailing and crippling the beneficial operations of the system. As I have said, I hold no brief for the Federal Reserve Board. I am perfectly willing that any and all investigations that are wanted should be had. I sincerely wish that action on the bill could be postponed until reports from recent investigations could be laid before the Senate.

The Senator from Alabama quotes Mr. Williams. He made his charges before a committee of the House, as I understand. I should very much like to know what the finding of that committee is. It may be that Mr. Williams is mistaken in many of his assertions. I know that they are disputed by members of the Federal Reserve Board. I think in a matter of this kind Congress ought to have full information before we condemn a great institution like the reserve board and imperil its successful functioning in the future.

I wish to say with all the emphasis at my command that there are two courts—two juries—in this country which never ought to be stacked or subjected to political influence: One is the Supreme Court of the United States and the other is the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. Does the Senator recall the fact that the Supreme Court has criticized the conduct of the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. McLEAN. I do not know about that. They may have made mistakes, but if we undertake to correct those mistakes let us do it in an intelligent way and in an effective way, if it is possible, instead of passing a bill which is simply a political maneuver and will amount to nothing.

Mr. President, I happen to have here a recent work entitled "Credit and Its Uses," by William A. Prendergast. He sets the nail with very few blows, and I wish to quote a few lines, because he agrees with every authority that I have been able to find bearing upon this subject. I quote from page 38:

It has always been a favorite practice of a certain brand of politicians to decry the influence of banks in public affairs, and endeavor in every possible way to prejudice the popular mind against these institutions. People are likely at some time or other to become restive under the domination of an institution or set of men who are really beyond their control, as banks and bankers actually are. Nor are we losing sight of the fact that our national banking system, as well as that of England and other nations, is subject to legislative surveillance and action, which, however, are usually spent when the laws concerning the creation and system of the banks are adopted. No legislature can expect to control the progress of these institutions and the power that by natural processes becomes theirs.

Credit is a most delicate, sensitive quantity; and the banking business being credit in its highest sense, it must not only be treated with all the circumspection its very nature calls for, but it must also be protected from the attacks of those who, although animated by entirely sincere views, would do irreparable injury to the credit system in their desire to advance their political principles or ambitions. It is quite important that the public should be thoroughly educated as to the vast benefits that accrue to commerce and civilization from that species of credit dispensed by banks. Banks act as the depositories of the funds of the people and exercise safe-keeping over those funds.

Mr. President, I realize that the Senators who advocate the measure expect to pass it, and I have no doubt they will, but I feel it to be my duty to call the attention of the Senate to a few of the many reasons which I think actuated the committee in rejecting the proposal of the Senator from South Carolina. I have no special interest in the matter. I have no pride of opinion with regard to it. I want Congress to do everything it can do in a legitimate way to help the agricultural interests; but it does seem to me that in a matter of this kind it would be much better to accept the report of the committee, which covers all the ground that can be covered, rather than go into this unsound, dangerous field and compel the President, in constituting this supreme court of finance, to choose a man who, upon the admission of the Senator from South Carolina, will act as the agent of a special interest.

[Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not wish to ask a question, but I am very anxious to have an executive session, if the Senator from Tennessee will yield for that purpose.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Kansas will permit me, I have said all I desire to say in reference to the particular amendment. I desire, however, now to offer an amendment to the pending bill to come in as a new section and to have it printed in the RECORD and lie on the table until the bill shall again be considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee will be received, printed in the RECORD, and ordered to lie on the table.

The amendment is as follows:

Add as a new section the following:

"SEC. —. That section 13 of the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913, be amended by adding after the words "being eligible for discount," and before the words "but such definition shall not include," the words: "And the notes, drafts, and bills of exchange of factors making advances exclusively to producers of staple agricultural products in their raw state shall be eligible for such discount."

Mr. EDGE. I submit two amendments intended to be proposed by me to the pending bill, which I ask may be read and lie on the table.

The amendments submitted by Mr. EDGE were read, ordered to be printed, and to lie on the table, as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "farming," to strike out the period and add the words: "and one shall be a person experienced in and whose business and occupation is manufacturing."

Page 2, line 5, after the word "farming," to strike out the period and add the words: "and one shall be a person experienced in and whose business and occupation is that of an official of organized labor."

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, needless for me to say, I do not favor the principle embodied in these amendments. This fact, I trust, I have already made clear. However, if any class is to be especially recognized, I think it only consistent to permit those who do approve of this policy to have the opportunity of going on record for or against the recognition of other important business or organized interests.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 234) authorizing the payment of salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1921, and making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 5 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 20, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 19, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, from whom all blessings flow, great and marvelous are Thy works, righteous and true are all Thy ways. We thank Thee for life, which is the breath of our heavenly Father in the souls of His human children, and may it be a daily offering at Thy sacred altar. We treasure Thy goodness. We can not measure it, yet may we continue to find favor with Thee. Enable us to prove ourselves altogether worthy of the tasks that await us and at the close of the day let us forget the labor we have borne and carry away the sense of Thy approval. In the name of Jesus our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, December 17, 1921, was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. MICHENER, was appointed on the committee to attend the funeral of the late Representative ELSTON, of California. Before he left he asked me to pair him in favor of the Russian relief bill. I failed to do so, and I wish to say that if he had been present, he would have voted for that bill.

The SPEAKER. On this call 249 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The doors were opened.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was Senate joint resolution 132, to provide for the continuance of certain Government publications.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard, and the Clerk will call the next bill.

FORT PECK RESERVATION, MONT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 8010) to authorize the leasing for mining purposes of unallotted lands on the Fort Peck Reservation, Mont.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] upon a former occasion interposed an objection to this bill, and he stated to me that he would be unavoidably absent to-day and desired a little more time to look into the matter. He requested me to ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice, which I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 234. Joint resolution authorizing the payment of salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1921, and making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 234. Joint resolution authorizing the payment of salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1921, and making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

SPECIAL DELIVERY OF MAIL MATTER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 8441, relating to special delivery of mail matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard, and the Clerk will call the next bill.

SURVEY OF PUYALLUP RIVER, WASH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 1578, to provide a preliminary survey of the Puyallup River, Wash., with a view to the control of its floods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause a preliminary survey to be made of the Puyallup River, Wash., with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River, and the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1917.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

SURVEY OF COWLITZ RIVER, WASH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1577) to provide a preliminary survey of the Cowlitz River, Wash., with a view to the control of its floods.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause a preliminary survey to be made of Cowlitz River, Wash., with a view to the control of its floods, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide for the control of the floods of the Mississippi River, and the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1917.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES REGARDING PUBLIC LANDS.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1099) to amend section 2372 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think we ought to have a word of explanation about the necessity for this before taking it up by unanimous consent.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts I will state that under section 7 of the act of March 3, 1891, it is provided that land shall pass to patent if within two years after the final proof and final certificate is issued and there is no contest or protest pending. It was the practice of the Department of the Interior to consider an adverse report made by a special agent against a homestead entryman a contest or a protest, and, acting upon some of these adverse reports, the Secretary of the Interior after the expiration of the two-year period has canceled the entry of the original entryman. In the case of Lane against Hoglund (244 U. S., p. 175) the Supreme Court of the United States held that such a report was not a protest or a contest, and held that the original entryman was entitled to patent. Now in some of these rulings of the Secretary of the Interior where he canceled the original entry he afterwards permitted other parties to make entry upon the same land, and the other parties now have patent to the land. Now the original entryman whose entry was canceled under that decision of the Supreme Court may come in and sue the patentee and have him declared a trustee for the original entryman. So this bill provides in those cases the Secretary of the Interior may permit the original entryman to change his entry and take other land. The Secretary informed me that there are some 40 or 50 cases of this kind in the Interior Department awaiting adjustment.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I do not think it ought to be taken care of in this way by changing the general law with reference to entrymen, and I object.

Mr. SINNOTT. If the gentleman will withhold for a moment.

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold.

Mr. SINNOTT. Unless this is done this original entryman may sue the patentee and take the land away from the second entryman, and the second entryman is without any remedy, although he may have lived upon the land for five years and spent several thousand dollars in improving it.

Mr. WALSH. Well, then, we perhaps can pass legislation for the relief of the second entryman, but I do not think we ought to change the general law in respect to these cases in anticipation of similar mistakes being made in the future, or the action of the department being upset by the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, this is for the advantage and benefit of the second entryman. The first entryman has his remedy at law as a vested right to pursue the patentee.

Mr. WALSH. Well, he may go ahead and sue him and see how he comes out. I object.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PLUMAS NATIONAL FOREST, CALIF.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5003) to provide for the consolidation of forest lands in the Plumas National Forest, Calif., and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from California is absent upon official business, and I desire to make some inquiries in reference to his report of hearings held upon this general subject, I object and ask that it be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the bill retain its place upon the calendar. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 234. Joint resolution authorizing the payment of salaries of officers and employees of Congress for December, 1921, and making an appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

EXTENSION OF TIME ON OIL AND GAS PERMITS.

The next business in order on the Unanimous Consent Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8344) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time under oil and gas permits, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior may, if he shall find that any oil or gas permittee has been unable, with the exercise of diligence, to begin drilling operations or to drill wells of the depth and within the time prescribed by section 13 of the act of Congress approved February 25, 1920, extend the time for beginning such drilling or completing it, to the amount specified in the act for such time, not exceeding three years, and upon such conditions as he shall prescribe.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

In line 7, page 1, after the figures "1920" insert in parentheses "(41st Stat., p. 437)."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Oregon state the necessity for this? What condition has arisen to make this extension desirable?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, the general financial condition out in the oil regions is very bad. There are some 11,000 applicants. A great many permittees can not obtain drilling outfits to drill, and the Secretary of the Interior has no authority to extend the time to begin operations, or to extend the time which requires that within one year after granting the permits they must drill to the depth of 500 feet. They may have drilled 400 feet or 200 feet; this bill merely permits the Secretary of the Interior to grant an extension of the time.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Are there not men who are financially capable of securing leases who are ready to go ahead and do the required drilling within the time?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, yes; some are.

Mr. WALSH. Are not there men who are desirous of securing these leases which are now held by men who are not able to do it?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, these men could not do all the drilling. There is a limit to the number of permits one person may obtain under the law.

Mr. WALSH. In their own name?

Mr. SINNOTT. Either directly or indirectly. It is merely granting the Secretary the authority to extend the time in which they are to commence drilling or to drill a hole 500 feet deep within one year.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield.

Mr. MANN. Is it a fact, as stated by the Secretary, that it is impossible for the manufacturers to supply sufficient drilling rigs and machinery with which to drill where all of these permits have been granted?

Mr. SINNOTT. I assume that is true. I have had letters from parties telling me that, although they have expended $4,000 in drilling, they have been unable to accomplish the drilling within the required time.

Mr. MANN. The Secretary's report states that the Secretary has issued an order that no action will be taken toward securing the cancellation of a permit because the permittee has not complied with the law, where it has been impossible for the permittee, owing to climate or lack of facilities, to go ahead with the drilling. Is this designed to make that legal, where now, I take it, it is illegal?

Mr. SINNOTT. It would make it legal and permit the Secretary to grant the extension that they are really granting now.

Mr. MANN. Where under the existing law a permittee drills the well 500 feet deep, is he then allowed an extension if the Secretary is willing to allow it?

Mr. SINNOTT. No. He is not permitted an extension under the law until at the end of two years, at which time he is supposed to have drilled to a depth of at least 2,000 feet. Then if it is necessary for him to drill more to develop the land, to ascertain whether there is oil there or not, the Secretary may grant the extension at the end of the two-year period, but he can not grant it short of the two-year period.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman afraid if this should become the law, there will be many applications for permits where there is no design at all to really go ahead with the work, in order to sell out?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; I do not think so. I think the Secretary will examine into those cases and ascertain whether or not the man has a really meritorious case for an extension.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the examination into those cases is by affidavit?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, the department has field agents who could examine the merits of the request in the field itself.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman from Oregon yield for a question?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Just for information. Under the law, what do they pay for these leases? Do they make any payment at all in money?

Mr. SINNOTT. Under a lease in unknown territory a man has the right to drill 2,560 acres, and then he secures a lease, having discovered oil, to one-fourth of it, and he pays 5 per cent for the oil extracted on the 160 acres. Then he has a preference right for the balance at a price to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior by competitive bidding or in some other way which the Secretary may adopt, at a minimum price of 12½ per cent—one-eighth.

Mr. JONES of Texas. He pays no actual money except as it is taken out of the ground?

Mr. SINNOTT. No.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does he have to pay renewal at any time where he does not drill within a certain specified time?

Mr. SINNOTT. He has to pay a dollar per acre a year on his lease.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Would this extension interfere with the necessity of paying that dollar a year where he is given this three-year extension?

Mr. SINNOTT. It does not impinge upon that at all. He is not required to pay the dollar an acre until oil is discovered and he then obtains a lease.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If they were private lands, however, and a man is given an extension, he is always required to pay a renewal of so much per acre per year.

Mr. SINNOTT. This merely relates to a prospecting permit on unknown territory.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I understand that is true, but you spoke a while ago of the inability to get machinery. Where a man has started drilling he would already have his machinery.

Mr. SINNOTT. He may lose his drill or have some other trouble. There are a great many contingencies that might arise.

Mr. JONES of Texas. There is no need of any trouble in getting repairs to machinery.

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, yes; there frequently is. A man may lose his drill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Nothing to justify a three-year extension.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is not a three-year extension. It does not extend beyond the two-year period.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It says three years in the latter part of the law.

Mr. SINNOTT. That would be a total.

Mr. JONES of Texas. He pays nothing whatever for this extension, then?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; he pays nothing for the extension.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of the objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, after the figures "1920," insert in parentheses "(41st Stat., p. 437)."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENTRYMEN ON RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the next bill on the calendar be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the next bill (H. R. 8815) to authorize certain homestead settlers or entrymen on United States reclamation projects who entered the military or naval service of the United States during the war with Germany to make final proof of their entries be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

APPLICATION OF RECLAMATION LAW TO IRRIGATION DISTRICTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, No. 147, was the bill (H. R. 4382) to provide for the application of the reclamation law to irrigation districts.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, the next bill on the calendar is No. 146. As to No. 147 on the calendar, I shall have to object to it.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. LITTLE. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE NIAGARA RIVER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2591) to provide for the construction of a public bridge across the Niagara River.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill who is behind this movement?

Mr. MACGREGOR. The citizens of the city of Buffalo.

Mr. MANN. That is not a very good answer. Will the gentleman be a little more specific? I do not know whether they are or not, but of course I do not doubt the gentleman's word.

Mr. MACGREGOR. If the gentleman will remember, last year he aided me in the passage of a bill, which was public law 128, creating the Buffalo Public Bridge Commission. The gentleman mentioned in this bill are the members of that commission. They have provided the plans for the construction of a bridge, which we fondly hope will be built. This bill under consideration to-day is the authority to those gentlemen constituting that commission to proceed with the construction of the bridge.

Mr. MANN. This is the result of the law that was passed last year?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Since I have been here there have been a great many laws passed for building a bridge across the Niagara River. Does the gentleman think there is any real intention—of course, he will not say there is not—of trying to build this bridge? Is it to be a bridge or a tunnel?

Mr. MACGREGOR. It is to be a bridge.

Mr. MANN. What is the tunnel end of it in here for?

Mr. MACGREGOR. It is simply the usual wording, as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. It has never been in any other bill before the House.

Mr. MACGREGOR. The plans call for a bridge.

Mr. MANN. Not a tunnel?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes; a bridge.

Mr. MANN. This provides for a tunnel.

Mr. MACGREGOR. A permissive tunnel.

Mr. MANN. That looks like a wildcat scheme.

Mr. MACGREGOR. If the War Department will permit us to build the bridge we have in contemplation and not make too many restrictions upon the height above the river, I think we shall be able really to construct this bridge. It will cost under the present plan about $2,000,000, at a height of 55 feet, which will permit the passage of small boats. There is another plan which calls for a height above the water of 114 feet, which would cost probably from $6,000,000 to $7,000,000, which it probably would not be possible to build because of the great cost. But these gentlemen feel that they can finance the $2,000,000 proposition without any great difficulty.

Mr. MANN. Has anybody made an estimate of what the cost of the tunnel would be?

Mr. MACGREGOR. No. I do not know why they stuck in the word "tunnel."

Mr. MANN. They not only stuck in the word "tunnel," but the word "tunnels," in the plural.

Mr. MACGREGOR. There have been other bridge acts in reference to the Niagara River which I think included the word "tunnel."

Mr. MANN. I think at one time we did provide that a company might build a bridge or tunnel. I do not know what they used that franchise for, whether it was to sell stock or otherwise.

Mr. MACGREGOR. I have not found anybody willing to buy any stock issued for building a bridge across the river yet. We have been perfectly willing to have them build it if they could.

Mr. MANN. I sympathize with the people of Buffalo in their desire to have better communication with Canada, so I shall not object.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this Buffalo Bridge Commission a body or commission under the jurisdiction of the city of Buffalo?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Not exactly. It is under the jurisdiction of Congress.

Mr. WALSH. Well, we created a commission.

Mr. MACGREGOR. It was approved by the council.

Mr. WALSH. Approved by the city council of Buffalo?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. It is expected that the city of Buffalo is going to contribute toward the construction of this bridge?

Mr. MACGREGOR. It will contribute in the way of land.

Mr. WALSH. Only in the way of land?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Why was not the bill drawn so as to permit the Buffalo Bridge Commission to erect this structure?

Mr. MACGREGOR. I could not say technically why they did not say "the bridge commission" instead of enumerating the same men who are named in the bill that we passed last year.

Mr. WALSH. Now, the matter of tunnel was incorporated in the bill at the suggestion of the State Department, as I understand it?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Oh, no.

Mr. WALSH. It was not?

Mr. MACGREGOR. No. They asked to have included there a provision that we should procure permission from the Dominion of Canada before commencing the construction. That, of course, we would have to have anyway.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman state whether the plans have been so far advanced that they will be able to begin work within two years?

Mr. MACGREGOR. If they can not commence within two years they can not commence at all.

Mr. WALSH. I understand that is what is in the bill; but does the gentleman know whether the commission has its plans already under way to such an extent that they will be able to begin work within two years?

Mr. MACGREGOR. They have the plans now.

Mr. WALSH. It is only a question of raising the $2,000,000?

Mr. MACGREGOR. That is all.

Mr. MANN. And then getting the permit?

Mr. MACGREGOR. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to Frank B. Baird, Edward J. Barcalo, Marcus Barmon, Frederick G. Bagley, Emanuel Boasberg, Col. Charles Clifton, John W. Cowper, William A. Eckert, Louis A. Fischer, Carmelo Gugino, Charles M. Heald, Edward B. Holmes, Allan I. Holloway, Edgar E. Joralemon, Charles B. Kane, Edward Kener, John A. Kloepfer, Stanislaus Lipowicz, Edward P. Lupfer, James H. McNulty, Jacob J. Siegrist, John W. Van Allen, John G. Wickser, Floyd M. Wills, and Frank Winch, and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a public bridge and approaches thereto across the Niagara River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, within or near the city limits of Buffalo, in the county of Erie, in the State of New York, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906: Provided, That subject to the provisions of this act the Secretary of War may permit the persons herein named to construct a tunnel or tunnels under said river in lieu of the bridge herein authorized, in accordance with the foregoing act approved March 23, 1906, so far as the same may be applicable.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void unless the construction of said bridge or tunnels is commenced within two years and completed within five years from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

with a committee amendment, as follows:

On page 2, line 15, after the word "applicable," insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That before the construction of the said bridge shall be begun all proper and requisite authority therefor shall be obtained from the Government of the Dominion of Canada."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the committee amendment by inserting on page 2, line 14, after the word "bridge," the words "or tunnels."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN to the committee amendment: On page 2, line 14, after the word "bridge," insert "or tunnel."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. MACGREGOR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass S. 2780.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to suspend the rules and pass a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The bill (S. 2780) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9 of the act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended, is hereby amended by striking out the words "six months" in such section and inserting in lieu thereof "18 months."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this bill (S. 2780) is a very short matter and ought not to take much time. In the trading with the enemy act approved October 6, 1917, there was a provision which allowed persons not enemies or enemy aliens to file suit in court in case their claims were disallowed by the Alien Property Custodian, and it provided further that a period of six months from the time of the declaration of peace be allowed for that purpose.

That time will expire on the 2d of January, 1922. It therefore becomes apparent that some action will have to be taken right away.

It appears from the statement of the Alien Property Custodian, as per the House committee report accompanying this bill and corroborated by a statement from the Attorney General's office, that the unconsidered claims are of such a number that the aforesaid departments have not been able to give attention to the claims on file. This means that those persons whose claims have not been considered by the 2d of January, 1922, would have to abandon their claims or the Alien Property Custodian would have to go through the list on file and in an arbitrary way, without consideration, disallow all the claims in order to make possible a day in court to these people, not enemies, chiefly Americans, who would wish to take exception to the disallowance.

The Senate passed this bill extending the time a year, and the bill has come to the House to-day as a result of an unanimous report made by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House.

I know of nothing more to be added, but it will be a pleasure to answer any questions. The fact is simply this, that the Alien Property Custodian and the Attorney General have not been able to go over all the claims on file, 1,500 of which have not been adjudicated, and they will not be able to go over them in a proper way in the time provided by law, and they ask an extra 12 months in which to give consideration to these claims. Can I answer any question?

Mr. HICKS. How fast are they going through the mill?

Mr. WINSLOW. I can not answer that. I might say, generally, that they are going through as fast as possible, I presume. Beyond that it would not be possible for me to make an answer.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves the remainder of his time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that it is necessary to add anything to what the gentleman from Massachusetts has said in reference to the object of this bill. This is a unanimous report from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on a bill recommended by the Alien Property Custodian's office and indorsed by the Department of Justice.

You will recall that in section 9 of the original Alien Property Custodian act a claimant whose property is taken, or who has claims for debts that might grow out of the taking of property, was authorized to file a claim before the Alien Property Custodian for the return of the property or for the return of the money realized out of the property, and that the President of the United States, after consideration, may order a return of the property or the proceeds thereof, whether in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian or of the Treasury of the United States.

Section 9 authorized the claimants to file suit in the district court of the United States in the district in which they reside, or, in the case of a corporation, in the district in which its principal office is located, for the return of the property, in a suit in equity, if the claim for the return for the property was rejected. They had six months after the declaration of peace to do that. I think that time expires on the 2d day of January, because the time began to run on the 2d of July last under the separate peace resolution enacted by Congress, so that the time in which they have to file these suits based upon the claims expires on the 2d day of next month.

As the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] has stated, there are some 1,500 or more of these claims now pending before the Alien Property Custodian based upon claims which have been filed for the return of property, and I think all of these claims have been filed by American citizens. It was inevitable that in the taking of a large amount of property, some property would be taken over that ought not to be taken. These claims have to be rejected before suit can be filed, and this is to give one more year for these claimants to file these suits.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the original act provide that the claimants may file suits for money damages in addition to having their property returned?

Mr. BARKLEY. No.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is, in the event the property itself is returned, can they still file suits for damages?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; this does not contemplate suits for damages. It contemplates suits for the return of the property itself or, if the property has been converted into money, a suit to recover the money realized out of the sale; or it might involve suits by creditors who had claims upon property which were defeated by the taking of the property by the Government. It does not contemplate the filing of suits for claims for damages in addition t the value of the property by reason of its being taken by the Government.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If there should be a case of such a character that the owner of the property claimed it was damaged one-half unnecessarily in use, would this extension be construed as authorizing a claim for damages in addition to the return of the property?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not think so; I do not think section 9 can be interpreted to extend to suits of that sort. It is based on claims for the return of the property or its value, or claims that might grow out of the possession of the property by the Government which a creditor might have a claim upon as against the original owner.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Of course, if it authorizes claims for damages or injury to property there would be no end of suits authorized.

Mr. BARKLEY. No. I do not think section 9 contemplates or authorizes suits of that sort.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the measure emergent in character.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is emergent in this way: The six months provided for in the original law expires the 2d day of January, and unless the bill is passed before that time there would be a lapse of time in which these claimants would have no rights.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I was unable to hear the response of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in respect to how many suits had already been entered—if that is the information which he gave.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not understand that the gentleman was asked that question.

Mr. WALSH. Then I shall ask the question now.

Mr. BARKLEY. He was asked the number of claims involved.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will permit me, I shall ask that question now.

Mr. WINSLOW. I can not say how many suits have been started, but there are 1,500 claims now pending.

Mr. WALSH. They have had six months to enter them. Is it because of some delay in the office of the Alien Property Custodian that these suits have not been entered?

Mr. BARKLEY. No. In the first place, the claimant had 60 days in which to file his claim before the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. WALSH. He did not have to wait for the proclamation of peace in order to do that.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand; but the gentleman from Massachusetts will realize that in the matter of taking over several hundred million dollars' worth of property it would be impossible for the Alien Property Custodian to adjust all of these claims, even if they were all filed within the time limit.

Mr. WALSH. He has had plenty of help down there to do it, and has plenty of attorneys, very distinguished attorneys.

Mr. BARKLEY. But that need not necessarily contribute to haste in the decision of those matters.

Mr. WALSH. I rather think that the gentleman may be right about that.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, the Alien Property Custodian says that he has not had time to dispose of these cases.

Mr. BARKLEY. This bill is in the nature of an emergency, because we have to take the word of the Alien Property Custodian in his statement that he has not had the time, and the Department of Justice is urging it because they agree with the statement of the Alien Property Custodian. Of course, the gentleman will realize that there has been a change in the personnel down there to some extent, which caused more or less of a slack in the operation of the department, which may have lost a little time.

Mr. WALSH. Not since the proclamation of peace.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that neighborhood somewhere.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is it not a fact that this request is based partially on the circumstance that the proclamation of peace dated back the termination of the war to the passage by Congress of the resolution terminating the war?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am informed that up to the time when the proclamation of peace was made by the President a great many people were of the opinion, whether rightfully or wrongfully I am not going to say, that the termination of the war within the meaning of the trading with the enemy act would not occur until a proclamation by the President.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The proclamation by the President antedated the termination of the war in a way, so that instead of having six months from the time of the President's proclamation, these people had only six months from July 2, 1921.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct. It was natural to presume that the six months would be from the actual date of the proclamation, which was not the 2d day of July, but several months subsequent to that time; but when the President issued his proclamation, he antedated it to July 2, which absorbed about half of the six months they would have had if the proclamation had been dated to take effect upon the date of its issue.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is it the purpose of the Alien Property Custodian to retain all of that big, fine building down there and pay the rent upon it during all of these 18 months?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know what the purpose of the Alien Property Custodian is with reference to retaining that big, fine apartment house on Sixteenth Street. As far as I am individually concerned, I would be glad to see his office moved out of that apartment house into one of the vacant Government buildings in the city of Washington, so that not only the Government would save the rent of the apartment house, but so that it would make it available for the occupation of men and their families here who desire places of residence.

As far as I am concerned, I do not know what the intention of the office is, and I do not know what contract they have with reference to this apartment house.

Mr. WINSLOW. If the gentleman will permit.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would be glad to yield.

Mr. WINSLOW. Information has come to us that the department has declined to make lease of the property and are now tenants from month to month, with a view that the coming year they can get out.

Mr. JONES of Texas. But, as a matter of fact, they still have the building which they occupied during the war when they had all the business of these different people to attend to.

Mr. WINSLOW. Well, the chances are that they have far more business now than they had before.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman know what rent they pay for that building?

Mr. WINSLOW. No, sir; I do not. This is a matter of helping out American citizens who want to get their money out of there if possible at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I understand. Was anything developed before the committee with reference to their keeping the building through the entire period?

Mr. WINSLOW. No——

Mr. JONES of Texas. It becomes important when you extend the time a year for winding up the business.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The extension of time is not going to slow up the work of the Alien Property Custodian. They have got these claims pending.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Has the gentleman any assurance of that?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. They have got those claims pending. Up to the present time they have not been able to pass upon them. Now, the claimants can not commence suit until they pass upon them. Now, the moment suit is commenced then it is matter for the Department of Justice to handle.

Mr. JONES of Texas. When you extend it 12 months or so they can take a long Christmas vacation if they want to do so. I do not say they will do so, but they are authorized and provided with a building, and there is nothing to keep them from doing so.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The furnishing of the building has nothing to do with it at all.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It has nothing to do with it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The commencing of suit against the Government is not going to affect the working capacity of the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It may affect the work.

Mr. BARKLEY. Since the gentleman from Texas has brought up the building, it might be suggested that while it is true any contract which the department may have had with the owners of the building could not have any effect upon this particular matter, as a matter of fact if the gentleman from Texas proposes to move this bureau out of the present quarters into some other place it might consume enough time, and it would be better to extend the life of the Alien Property Custodian longer than a year——

Mr. JONES of Texas. It might be if the work is as slow as on some other propositions.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield? I merely want to make a further suggestion that you might reduce the work of the Alien Property Custodian by preventing the people from getting proper consideration of their claims in that office, and certainly we do not want to delay, but to pass, legislation which will facilitate the opportunities for American citizens to present their claims before the Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say in reply to the suggestion that a vast majority of these claimants are American citizens who claim their property was wrongfully taken, and that there was an erroneous construction placed upon its ownership, and those claims have been so voluminous that the Alien Property Custodian has not been able to pass upon them. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS].

Mr. BRIGGS. What is the amount of those claims that have already been filed; does the gentleman know?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not able to give the gentleman the amount in dollars and cents. Perhaps the chairman can give it.

Mr. WINSLOW. The aggregate amount?

Mr. BARKLEY. But it amounts to millions and millions.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Is the Alien Property Custodian continuing to make seizures under the act?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I think not.

Mr. BRIGGS. I have understood recently they were continuing at least, if not to make seizures, to bring proceedings in reference to property which was claimed before the treaty of peace was signed and the proclamation of the President issued.

Mr. BARKLEY. They may have taken steps to appraise the property claimed prior to the end of the war, but no new claims, I understand, are now being filed against the property.

Mr. BRIGGS. Are suits being filed subsequently?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think not. It is barely possible that some claims were hanging there after work upon the case started, and they were ready to seize the property. But, generally speaking, the Alien Property Custodian has not taken steps to seize property ab initio or de novo.

Mr. BRIGGS. They regard that the treaty of peace has stopped and ended all that?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. Speaker, reserving the balance of my time, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has only three and one-half minutes remaining. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for that period of time.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it seems that the plan of those in control of the House is to take a recess without considering many important measures which are on our calendars. One of those measures which is of great interest to the farmers is a joint resolution which has already passed the Senate and is on the Union Calendar of the House. For the purpose of showing that it is a measure of very considerable importance, I ask to have read a communication from the Secretary of Agriculture which has been furnished me by a constituent to whom it had been sent.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to interpose an objection, but of course the rules require that under a motion to suspend the debate shall be confined to the motion.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If the gentleman will allow, it will take only two or three minutes, and then I will not ask to proceed further.

Mr. WALSH. Is it a brief communication?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Very brief.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C.

PUBLICATION OF MARKET REPORTER SUSPENDED.

Under a provision of the sundry civil act of March 4, 1921, Government departments were required to suspend publication of all periodicals except those approved by Congress by December 1, 1921. A resolution empowering the congressional Joint Committee on Printing to authorize the continuance or discontinuance of these periodicals, among them the Market Reporter, passed the Senate but did not come to a vote in the House before the adjournment of the last session of Congress. The Market Reporter will, therefore, be suspended beginning with the issue of December 10 until its continuance is authorized by Congress.

HENRY C. WALLACE, Secretary.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he objects to my adding to that a few lines extracted from a letter which a constituent has written me concerning this subject?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I shall not insist on the objection.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The statement in the letter that comes from a very prominent and influential business man and farmer is as follows:

I believe as a farmer and banker the Market Reporter issued by the United States Department of Agriculture has been most helpful to the farmers in this county, and I can not see why it would not be equally as helpful to farmers in other counties and States, and it is the one market report that comes to our homes upon which we can absolutely rely.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that, in the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds had voted in favor thereof.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 69, noes none.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. It is clear there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 247, nays 0, answered "present" 1, not voting 184, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to bring up under suspension of the rules a joint resolution from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not need to ask permission. The Clerk will report the House joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 237.

Resolved, etc., That in individual cases upon a satisfactory showing being made as to extreme hardship or danger of death the Secretary of Labor is hereby authorized to stay for not to exceed six months at a time the deportation of persons arriving in the United States in excess of quotas authorized by the act of May 19, 1921 (public No. 5), under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That such persons are proved to be of the following classes: (1) Fathers, (2) mothers, (3) husbands, (4) wives, (5) children, (6) dependent minor unmarried brothers under 18 years of age, (7) dependent unmarried sisters of citizens of the United States, or of persons domiciled in the United States for at least two years who shall give competent bond for the support of and for the return to the custody of the United States of all such temporarily admitted persons, or (8) minor dependent orphans under the age of 18 years.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I demand a second.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Box] will take their places as tellers. As many as are in favor of ordering a second will pass between the tellers.

Pending the count of the vote by tellers—

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my motion for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington withdraws his motion.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the Speaker quite sure that at this stage of the proceedings the motion can be withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. Yes. I have had it looked up, and am so advised.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 151.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], that the House do now adjourn. Those in favor of the motion will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 69, nays 168, answered "present" 4; not voting 188, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. ELLIOTT with Mr. BOWLING.

Mr. TREADWAY with Mr. COLLIER.

Mr. REBER with Mr. FAVROT.

Mr. LUHRING with Mr. HARRISON.

Mr. KENNEDY with Mr. TAGUE.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan with Mr. GARRETT of Texas.

Mr. CONNOLLY of Pennsylvania with Mr. DUPRÉ.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recorded.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name was called?

Mr. BURTON. No; I was not. I record myself as present.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

ANTILYNCHING.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 253.

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider H. R. 13 (House Calendar No. 98) in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as though the bill were on the Union Calendar. Thereupon it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 13, being a bill "to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching." That there shall be not to exceed 10 hours of general debate on said bill, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VOLSTEAD) and one-half by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. SUMNERS). At the conclusion of the general debate the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendments the committee shall rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, if any; the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and on all amendments thereto to final passage, without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for the purpose of having some agreement as to the time in the discussion of the rule?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have an agreement with the gentleman from North Carolina and with the House as to the time to be consumed on the rule if we can agree.

Mr. POU. Of course, this is a matter of very great importance, and I think that an hour on a side on the rule would not be more than would be reasonably consumed. I have quite a number of requests on this side, and I suggest an hour on a side. I think we can get along on this side with an hour, and I do not see how we can get along with less than an hour unless somebody is cut down to two or three minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Can the gentleman get on with 30 minutes?

Mr. POU. I could not. I know the gentleman is always agreeable in making these agreements, but I say to him very frankly that I have requests here for 50 minutes, outside of taking up any time myself, and I would like a few minutes to submit some observations on the bill. Of course, the discussion on the rule will almost of necessity be a discussion of the measure itself.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What would the gentleman from North Carolina say to having an agreement to extend the time for general debate on the bill and come to a vote early on the rule?

Mr. POU. I would not object to any extension of the time for debate on the bill that the gentleman might see proper to suggest in addition to the time already provided; but in view of the fact that we have so many requests for time on the rule, I very much hope that the gentleman will see his way clear to give us an hour on a side.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Of course, the debate on the rule will not be on the rule itself but upon the bill. I am willing to increase the time for general debate on the bill if that is agreeable to the gentleman and then to have 30 minutes on a side on the rule.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. During the enforced absence of the gentleman from North Carolina the other day on account of illness the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] did me the courtesy to speak to me about the time on the rule, and I suggested to him then that we hoped for an hour. I do not mean that the gentleman promised me that there would be an hour, but I myself have said to gentlemen on this side that I thought we might reasonably hope to have an hour on this side on the rule.

Now, of course, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] has said, all men realize that this is an important matter, and the discussion of the rule is quite as important as the discussion of the bill itself.

Gentlemen understand the situation. It has been my understanding—although, of course, no agreement to that effect has been had—that this matter would not be voted on finally before the holidays. If that is to be the case, why is it that we can not have a little more time on the thing that we are going to vote on, namely, the adoption of the rule, rather than to cut short the debate on the rule?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If we can come to an agreement for an extension of time on the rule, what would the gentleman from North Carolina say to having the previous question agreed to at the conclusion of the debate on the rule? That would save the 30 minutes that would be consumed by a roll call.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Whether the previous question will be contested at that time I can not say to the gentleman now, but on a measure of this importance I do not feel that he should ask us to cut ourselves off from any of our parliamentary rights.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I realize that this bill and the rule providing for its consideration will be contested at every point, but I think I am not presuming too much when I presume that if the time for debate on the rule is extended we should avoid a roll call on the previous question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I would suggest to the gentleman that he take the time which he has in mind to be added to the general debate upon the bill and add it to the time upon the rule. I understood that it was the desire of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and others, that the time for general debate on the bill itself be extended perhaps to 20 hours.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not so much as that, I think, but there is more demand for time for debate than is provided for in the rule. I have thought that we might now agree on extending that time. If that can not be done it will be necessary to extend the time later on in order to accommodate those who desire to discuss the bill in general debate.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I did not catch the reading of the rule. Is debate under the rule in committee to be confined to the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not by the terms of the resolution.

Mr. POU. Permit me to say very frankly to my friend from Kansas that there is a very serious controversy over the adoption of this rule.

It is not confined to party lines. The line that will divide the House with respect to this is not a party line at all. There are gentlemen on the Republican side as well as on the Democratic side who feel very deeply about the adoption of this rule and the bill that it makes in order. Under these circumstances it would seem to me that an hour on a side on the rule is not an unreasonable request to make.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, it is now 2.30 o'clock. I ask unanimous consent that the vote upon the rule be taken at 4.30 o'clock, and that the time for debate upon the rule be controlled one-half by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the time for debate upon the rule be controlled one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], and that the vote be taken upon the rule at 4.30 o'clock p. m. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Would that agreement operate in respect to the previous question being ordered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would think that it would, if it is agreed that the vote upon the rule itself shall be taken at 4.30 o'clock.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have already stated that the gentleman from Kansas should not ask us to waive any of our parliamentary rights. Gentlemen know how much time they are going to have for debate upon the bill itself. If they are going to ask for 20 hours, cut off some of that and let it be applied upon the discussion of the rule itself. That will be satisfactory. We can not waive any of our parliamentary rights in respect to this matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then, Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite the matter so that we may get started, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon the rule close at 4.30 o'clock and on all amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that debate upon the rule and upon all amendments thereto close at 4.30 o'clock p. m.

Mr. POU. I think the time ought to be fixed definitely. I mean that there should be so much general debate—an hour upon a side.

Mr. MONDELL. That gives an hour on a side.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It may, and again it may not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If the gentleman contemplates quorum calls between now and 4.30 o'clock, the time taken up in the calling of the roll will be deducted from the time for debate upon the rule. We may just as well understand each other.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Suppose there was a call of the House in progress at 10 minutes before half past 4 o'clock, what would be the situation?

Mr. MANN. Under the precedents, the quorum call would be completed before the vote would be taken.

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly; and none will be made on this side, I feel I may assure the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We will not take up the time in the calling of the roll.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate upon the bill be fixed at 14 hours instead of 10.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not take up any of the time for debate upon the rule by making that request now. That can be done at a later time. We have a definite hour fixed for debate upon the rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, for the present, I object.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this rule deals with a bill on the House Calendar which provides for extending the equal guaranties of the Constitution to all citizens. It is known as the antilynching bill. The resolution takes the bill from the House Calendar and places it on the Union Calendar, and provides that it shall be in order on the adoption of the resolution to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill. The rule provides for 10 hours of general debate on the bill. It is conceded on both sides that that does not provide all of the time that is required and that at some time during the discussion this time will be extended, if the demand continues. Then the bill is to be considered under the five-minute rule and reported back to the House with such amendments as may be agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question which is in the nature of a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If the resolution should be adopted in the form in which it is offered providing for general debate, will debate be permissible upon other than the questions involved in the bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The rule does not confine debate to the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Could any irrelevant debate be prevented by the point of order being made that it is not in order?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think not.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Then the situation would be open for debate upon any and all questions?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We will be in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the debate, not being limited to the bill by the rule, could follow the inclination of the Member having the floor.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I only asked that question, if my friend will permit me to say a word further, because it seems to me a most extraordinary thing to take this important measure up in the way now proposed, have a debate upon it ranging over the face of the earth, and then, perhaps, after two or three weeks, vote on the measure itself.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is a matter that must address itself to the judgment of the Member having the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I presume it is the purpose of the gentleman and those in charge of the bill not to undertake to have a vote upon the bill itself prior to the Christmas recess?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not advising the gentleman from Alabama nor the Members of the House in respect to that question. I am not saying when the vote will occur on the bill. It is a bill of very great importance and is to be considered for amendment after the general debate is concluded. I have no doubt that it will require some time to consider the bill for amendment. The rule gives ample time and the widest latitude for the consideration of the bill.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, the rule which makes in order this legislation I do not think is controverted in any point, and therefore I do not care to confine my remarks to the rule itself. I did not hesitate to vote for the rule making this in order, because the interest involved in the legislation is so paramount, it strikes me, that the House of Representatives should not hesitate to take a position. The report that has been made upon the bill by the committee reporting it gives some very startling facts about the subject of lynching. It is a sad comment upon the high standard of our civilization, when compared with other countries. The report states that in the 30 years from 1889 to 1918, 3,224 persons were lynched, of whom 2,522 were Negroes, and of these 50 were women. The North had 219, the West 156, Alaska and unknown localities 15, and the South had 2,834, with Georgia leading with 386, Mississippi following with 372. The report goes on to state that in the State of Georgia, where 386 lynchings occurred, the Negroes paid taxes on 1,664,368 acres of property assessed at $47,000,000. These startling figures demand the attention of this Congress. The report which will be of interest to all Members who are concerned with the good name of the Nation specifies the number of lynchings in the various States. I recognize that there is a feeling in the minds of some that the bill is especially designed for the protection of a certain people with little concern for others and is to be applied to a certain section of the country. That really is not entirely true; it may be largely so, since in certain sections are found the great number and affects one race more than another. The truth about the matter is that the law is just as applicable to Ohio as to the South. If it affects the latter more it is because its crimes are greater. However, one of the most indescribable lynchings of all the country, indescribable because of its lawlessness and brutality, took place in my own State of Ohio. It was the lynching of a representative citizen who had been very active in the agitation of the promotion of temperance sentiment for the prohibition of the liquor traffic. He had become very active, and had so wrought up a portion of the population that he was pursued by a mob which took the law into their own hands in defiance of the authority of the town. He was taken by an angry mob, made up it was said by residents of one of the most respectable cities of Ohio, and inhumanly treated beyond description. It was so amazing and so shocked the better sense of the people, not only of the city but it involved the interest of the entire country, that one of the best writers in America was sent to the city to make a study of the general morale of the town which had permitted such an outrage, especially in vie- of the fact that such an inhuman performance could take place in what was looked upon as one of the best cities of the State. The upshot of this sort of lawlessness which besmirches the good name of any State was a legislative act in the State of Ohio on the basis of this bill, which we now propose for the Nation.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Is it not a fact that under the terms of the present bill the party committing that offense the gentleman has just described in the State of Ohio could not be punished? Is it not a fact the bill itself provides that the party who was lynched must have been lynched for some crime that he had committed, and according to the gentleman's statement the man had committed no crime but was enforcing the law?

Mr. FESS. I do not want to get into a controversy with the gentleman. The gentleman fully understands that if we have a law in Ohio punishing lynching and a law in the Federal Government for the same purpose there is concurrent jurisdiction both by State and Nation over the cases to be dealt with by the State, if it will do its duty, and by the Nation if the State refuses to do its duty. This bill is no interference whatever in the enforcement of the law in Ohio. In addition, it supplements the law of Ohio, and better still, it supplies authority for protection in the States which do not afford protection. I meant to state that the law put upon the statute books by my own State was similar to this law. I think that every man who is acquainted with the situation in my own State recognizes the salutary effect of that law. No one desires it repealed. It is written upon the principle that if an outlawry of any city, such as I have in mind, would permit such an inhuman thing as this, then the city itself ought to suffer the penalty of the outlawry. That is in substance what this bill proposes to do for all the country. I am very much concerned about the ease with which many of us excuse unlawful acts. It is not in the interest of any particular race that legislation to protect citizens in their lives should be placed upon the statute books. We boast of a country of law and order extended to all citizens alike. This bill is primarily in the interest of respect for law and order; and one of the things that in my judgment is our greatest danger in America, as well as in other parts of the world, is that we are looking with too much levity upon brutality that respects no law, by defiantly taking the law into their own hands and stamping upon all regulated authority. Whenever anyone excuses an act that is not lawful, no matter what the provocation may be, he invites the collapse of all authorized government. He is opening a door to lawlessness, the extent of which no man can now see. [Applause on the Republican side.] And it is in that respect that I say that our own country can not afford to allow such lawlessness as herein revealed in any spot or section of the land. To permit the practice of such an unfortunate record as is here recounted in the report of this committee is simply incredible. While it is unfortunate that many of our membership here charge that the legislation is designed to be sectional, it is not so, except as the occurrences seem sectional. But so far as I am concerned, I want to prevent this crime of lawlessness wherever it occurs.

I say that no one can study the movement recently out at Omaha, where all Government authority gave way to the mob spirit, without being impressed with the danger confronting us. Some people have been quoted more or less in defense of that crime. That is the real danger—the attitude of so many people on such occurrences. Such a movement as that becomes not only a matter of enormity because of what was done but of still greater enormity because some people are willing to excuse the doing of the very things that the civilization of this day condemns and ought to make impossible for all time. [Applause.] I am not going to put the matter upon the basis of any obligation that has been made in the terms of any political platform, nor by the candidate for President by any party, nor upon the suggestion of distinguished authorities in history.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. Nor do I put it upon the suggestion of President Wilson in his message to the country on the subject, nor upon the suggestion of Col. Roosevelt, who took an outstanding position for law and order; I am not putting it upon the basis of authority, quoting leading figures in behalf of such protective legislation. I put it squarely upon the basis of the dangerous tendency of an excuse for any act that is unlawful. [Applause.] That, I repeat, is the farthest-reaching influence for danger that we have before the country to-day; and so I regret that any Member of the House would intimate that this legislation is specifically to be attached to or to attack any particular section or people. If the section which resists this legislation would protect its citizens against the unlawful act of lynching there would be no occasion for this proposal.

To apply the law where the crime occurs is not sectional. If it occurs in only one place the crime is sectional—not the law. This Nation can not continue to close its eyes and excuse the crime because its remedy would be charged as sectional. Law is never sectional when applicable to crime.

We simply say to all States in simple and brief language that if you do not protect within your own borders the citizens against the crime of lynching, by giving them due process of law, the Federal Government will supply that protection.

Some Members raise the constitutional question.

This much I am satisfied with, that while the constitutional question will be involved, and while I am sensitive as to taking anything for granted that is extremely in doubt, I do not believe there is any serious doubt upon the constitutionality of this particular legislation. I think the authority is specific by the the force of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. So far as the argument on authority is concerned, we can build up a body of authority of the highest judgment in the world sustaining the basis of this legislation as being constitutional. Consequently that is not disturbing me very much. I think there is no doubt about our freedom to do it in view of the specific delegation of the power therein specified and also because of the authority that has been announced by men who know the significance of the legislation. But far and away and above any particular protection for any particular people, I want to do my part in the protection of the future of our American system, because we are a government of law and not a country of anarchy. If law is ignored, if its force is broken, we have nothing left. It is simply incredible that any man in this day will defend lynching by denying authority to stop it. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back whatever time I did not use.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, lynching is murder. The fact that the crime is committed by five persons instead of by one does not lessen the offense, but, on the contrary, aggravates it. It is true that lynching is often inspired by the desire on the part of the lynchers to do justice and by their fear that if resort is had to the courts the technicalities and the delays of the law will prevent the speedy punishment they believe the criminal deserves. But regardless of the motive, it is murder, and for it I have no defense to make nor apology to offer. And neither have I any defense to make for the lawlessness of a legislative body. You can not cure lawlessness by indulging in it yourselves. This you do when you pass a bill so clearly in violation of the Constitution as it has been construed to this date by the United States Supreme Court.

The only explanation of the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who has preceded me, that he regards it as constitutional, is that he has not had the opportunity to investigate the decisions of the Supreme Court.

This legislation furnishes an excellent exhibition of the spirit of the mob. To mete out to the rapist the punishment they think he deserves the mob is willing to violate the law. To mete out to the lyncher of the rapist the punishment you think he deserves you are willing to violate the Constitution. Their act is in heat and passion, yours in calm deliberation.

It is urged that the Republican Members of the House should vote for this bill because it is indorsed by the Republican platform of 1920. But the fact is that the platform contains no such declaration. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People who are responsible for the presentation of this bill to the House pleaded with the Republican convention for such a declaration in the platform. But notwithstanding the political necessities of the occasion be it said to the credit of the Republican convention that it refused to indorse this legislation and contented itself with the mere request that the Congress "consider the most effective means to prevent lynching."

If this bill is the answer to that request, I think it unfortunate, because I am satisfied that even if the unthinkable should happen, and it be held constitutional, it would prove ineffective in preventing lynching, and, on the contrary, would tend to increase lynching.

No justification for belief in its effectiveness can be secured from the experience of the States which have enacted similar legislation. The Constitution of the State of South Carolina adopted December 4, 1895, contains the following provision:

In the case of any prisoner lawfully in the charge, custody, or control of any officer. State, county, or municipal, being seized and taken from said officer through his negligence, permission, or connivance, by a mob or other unlawful assemblage of persons, and at their hands suffering bodily violence or death, the said officer shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon true bill found shall be deposed from his office pending his trial, and upon conviction shall forfeit his office, and shall, unless pardoned by the governor, not be eligible to hold any office of trust or profit within the State. It shall be the duty of the prosecuting attorney within whose circuit or county the offense may be committed to forthwith institute a prosecution against said officer, who shall be tried in such county, in the same circuit, other than the one in which the offense was committed, as the Attorney General may elect. The fees and mileage of all material witnesses, both for the State and for the defense, shall be paid by the State treasurer in such manner as may be provided by law: Provided, In all cases of lynching when death ensues the county where such lynching takes place shall, without regard to the conduct of the officers, be liable in exemplary damages of not less than $2,000 to the legal representatives of the person lynched: Provided further, That any county against which a judgment has been obtained for damages in case of lynching shall have the right to recover the amount of said judgment from the parties engaged in said lynching in any court of competent jurisdiction.

The clause penalizing the county in which a lynching takes place, as finally adopted, was offered by Senator Tillman, a member of the convention, who stated that it might not prove effective, but should serve as a "scarecrow." The adoption of this provision was an expression of the sentiment of the law-abiding people of South Carolina against the lawlessness of the mob. The same sentiment has resulted in a gratifying decrease in the number of lynchings in South Carolina during recent years. But that this reduction is not due to the constitutional provision or the statute which followed it is evident from the statistics as to lynchings in that State. Because no two authorities agree as to the exact number of lynchings, I quote from the Negro Yearbook, published by the director of the department of research of Tuskegee Institute, the leading institution of learning for Negroes in this country. Their figures run as far back as 1885. For the 11-year period from 1885 to 1895, inclusive, there were 1,897 lynchings in the United States and 45 in South Carolina. The constitution of South Carolina, as I have stated, was adopted December 4, 1895. For the 11-year period succeeding the adoption of this constitution with its antilynching provision, to wit, from 1896 to 1906, inclusive, there were 1,206 lynchings in the United States and 43 in South Carolina. The figures given by the World's Almanac show for the 11-year period preceding the adoption of the South Carolina constitution 44 lynchings in that State, and for the 11-year period succeeding the adoption of the constitution 38. Whichever is correct the fact remains that while in the Nation there was a considerable reduction in the number of lynchings from 1896 to 1906 there was a comparatively small reduction in the number of lynchings in South Carolina, and the legislation now relied upon as a precedent did not prove very effective in suppressing lynching.

Now, it is true, and I rejoice that it is true, that during the next period of 11 years, from 1906 to 1916, inclusive, there were only 26 lynchings, and this gratifying improvement continued from 1916 to 1920. But this reduction in the number of lynchings was due not to the constitutional provisions referred to, but to the ceaseless and intelligent campaign conducted by the press, the pulpit, and the judiciary of South Carolina to suppress this crime. Fearlessly and effectively the press has denounced lynching and lynchers and labored for the creation of a sentiment in favor of upholding the law regardless of the provocation, and their efforts have contributed in great measure to the progressive decrease in the number of lynchings in the State during the last 15 years.

I know that attention will be called to the fact that this committee report shows that five lynchings have occurred in South Carolina this year. Unfortunately that is true, and this is more than the combined total of the three preceding years. But the crimes committed and the lynchings that followed were simply part of the inexplicable wave of crime that swept over the country this year, and which happily seems now to have receded.

Lest gentlemen argue that in South Carolina the antilynching law has not been enforced, let me say that an earnest effort has been made to enforce it. In many cases brought to recover the $2,000 penalty from the county the circuit judges have directed verdicts for the plaintiff without even submitting the facts to the jury, and their action has been sustained by the supreme court of the State.

An examination of the records of Illinois and Ohio, the only other States I know of having similar laws, would indicate that in those States they have not been successful in suppressing lynching.

It may be argued that while ineffective when enforced by the States, it will be effective when enforced by United States officials and in the United States courts. I disagree with this view. This legislation is certain to arouse the deepest resentment on the part of the people of the States, who will regard it as an unwarranted invasion of the rights of the States; and it must not be forgotten that jurors in the United States courts come from the States and are affected by the same influences that govern the conduct of jurors in the State courts.

To enforce this law you will soon require an army of Federal police, who must invade the State to secure evidence against the participants in a lynching, the officials of the county, and the county itself. One can easily imagine the resentment that will be aroused by such efforts to enforce the law against murder, which has heretofore been regarded as exclusively within the jurisdiction of the State.

In the enforcement of the Volstead Act we have noted the disposition on the part of the people and the officers of a State to relax their efforts in enforcing State statutes and leave entirely to the agents of the United States Government the enforcement of the law, a disposition which is resulting in an increased number of violations. How much less cooperation will the antilynching police receive when their presence will be resented by the people of the State?

And this feeling will not be confined to the Southern States. Experience in recent years has shown that the lynching spirit is not restricted by geographical boundaries. As the Negroes have migrated from the South to the North there has been a decrease in the number of lynchings in the South and an increase in the number occurring in the Northern States.

But this law does not apply solely to the lynching of Negroes. It applies wherever five or more persons kill a human being. Industrial conflicts seem unavoidable in the North, and when strikes occur homicides often occur. If either striker or strike breaker is killed by five or more persons the case comes within the provisions of this bill, the laborers will be tried in the United States court, the county officers will be tried in the United States courts if there is any evidence of negligence, and the court will forfeit $10,000 no matter how powerless its officers may have been to prevent the homicide or how efficient they thereafter were in arresting the criminals.

I appeal to the thoughtful Republicans of the House who can be induced to vote for this measure only if they are convinced that it is constitutional and will suppress mob law. I submit that while it may please a few misguided Negro leaders it will defeat the very purpose they seek to accomplish and will encourage instead of discourage lynching. It will undo the efforts of years of leaders of thought in the various States, efforts which have resulted in the progressive decrease of lynchings as shown by the figures submitted to the Judiciary Committee by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People for each five-year period from 1889 to 1918, which are as follows:

Years.	Total number.	Per cent decrease.
1889–1893	839
1894–1898	774	7.8
1899–1903	543	35.2
1904–1908	381	54.6
1909–1913	362	57.2
1914–1918	325	61.3

This is a record of improvement of which the law-abiding people of the country may justly be proud. It has not been accomplished through fear of prosecution by the United States Government or fear of incurring penalties. You can not prevent a lynching by advising a mob of frenzied men in possession of a miserable rapist or murderer that their action will cost the county $2,000 or $10,000. The only successful appeal to a mob is the assurance of those in authority that the criminal will receive a speedy trial if the law is allowed to take its course.

If you would comply with the request of your platform to seek the most effective means of ending lynching, let the enforcement of the law against murder remain with the States. Urge upon the States the revision of laws to insure a speedy trial to those charged with heinous offenses. Encourage the law-abiding white people of the country who are daily denouncing lynching to continue their efforts to suppress it. And then have the courage to tell the Negro leaders who are urging the passage of this bill that a duty devolves upon them. Notwithstanding their protestations, it is a fact that rape is responsible directly and indirectly for most of the lynchings in America. I know that law-abiding Negroes deplore the commission of this crime, but I have read much of their literature, and while I have found much denunciation of the mob and expressions of sympathy for its victim, I have yet to find in Negro publications one word in denunciation of Negro rapists. Let them know that it is their duty to create a sentiment among their own people against the crime of rape which dethrones the reason of men and destroys the efforts of those who are laboring for the preservation of law and order in America.

I appeal to you not to vote for this rule. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] use some more of his time?

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL].

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, lynching is a relic of barbarism. It is horrible to contemplate. It is degrading to civilized people. Anything humanly possible should be done that would really prevent it. This bill would fail utterly to accomplish the purpose. It would do nothing to remove the cause, check the criminal, or prevent mob action. It would usurp local authority and humiliate the local officers of the law; it would arouse local antagonism, encourage the criminal, which would stimulate the mob spirit, and increase the number of lynchings. Who would want to be local judge or sheriff under the operations of this bill? The positions would be perilous.

Civilization is as yet imperfect, so let us consider conditions frankly. No good citizen approves lynching or mob violence in any form. Every Member of the Congress is opposed to mob law. You calmly discuss it here impersonally, but should your wife or your daughter be criminally assaulted by an African brute would you be restrained by the fear of a tax on the county? Are you yourself certain of your course in such an emergency? When the horror of criminal assault comes home to us let us not be too boastful or too certain of ourselves. Let us seek first to remove the cause that provokes lynching.

A mob is not a conspiracy. It is the result of hysteria. This bill defines a mob as a riotous assemblage of five or more persons, and proposes to prevent lynching (1) by giving the Federal courts jurisdiction in all cases of lynching, (2) by punishing State and municipal officers for not protecting criminals from mobs, (3) by punishing those who participate in lynching, and (4) by compelling the county in which the lynching occurs or counties through which the criminal may be transported to pay $10,000 for the benefit of the criminal's family. It is proposed not only to deprive the local authorities of the right to prosecute the members of a mob, but to fine and imprison the local officers at the whim of the Federal authorities.

This bill is copied from the Ohio and South Carolina laws, which are, of course, State statutes, and local in their operation. Ohio still has her lynchings, as shown by the records. The futility of this proposed legislation is revealed by the interesting fact of record that the South Carolina antilynching law was enacted in 1895, 26 years ago, and South Carolina had five lynchings that year. Your committee report shows that South Carolina has had exactly five lynchings in this year—1921—revealing that not even a State law of this character, authorized by a State constitution, is or can be effective.

It is noted that in the hearings on this bill before the Judiciary Committee the discussions centered about the race question. It is fair to state that thinking men recognize that rape or attempted rape is the primary cause of the mob spirit. Remove this cause and other lynchings will cease also.

Analyzed and stripped of redundancy, this is a bill put forward by the Republican leaders for political purposes to satisfy the Negro agitator. It may have other purposes, but it is specifically intended to pretend to protect from mobs the assaulters of women. Excepting the cases listed as murder, one-half of which are really cases of rape and murder, assaults or attempted assaults upon women have been the cause of 56 per cent of all the lynchings in the United States in the past 30 years. What do you propose to do in this bill to remove the cause that provokes lynching which is fundamental in solving this question? You offer nothing.

Even if a Federal statute would prevent lynching, what is the occasion for this bill at this particular time? The outlaw, the thief, the bandit, the murderer, is unusually active, but is there a plethora of lynchings now that threatens the country and seems to create a necessity for this bill? Not at all. The report of your committee on page 4 shows that lynching is steadily decreasing. The report shows that the average number of lynchings in the country for the past 30 years is 108 per year. The report also states that there were 65 lynchings in the United States in 1920, which means a reduction in 1920 below the average for 30 years of 43 lynchings, or a reduction in lynchings of 40 per cent. The Literary Digest, January 22, 1921, states that in 1920 61 lynchings occurred in the United States, as follows:

Texas, 10; Georgia, 9; Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, each 7; California, Minnesota, North Carolina, Oklahoma, each 3; Arkansas, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Missouri, Ohio, South Carolina, Virginia, West Virginia, each 1, covering 18 States.

This shows a decrease in lynchings of 25 per cent as compared with the preceding year. The reduction was accomplished under State control without the intermeddling of the Federal Government. Then, why your eagerness now to interfere with the local police authorities? Is it because the elections are less than a year away and you sorely need the Negro vote to stem the rising tide against the Republican Party? You are mistaken, however. You will not gain any Negro votes. They are for you already, but by this bill you will lose the support of many thousand very decent white men and white women.

The criminal who would assault a woman is not easily deterred. He is deterred, if at all, only by knowing in advance that when captured he will meet certain and immediate death. By this bill, without protecting the criminal in fact, you would greatly increase the number of criminal assaults and resulting cases of mob violence. You would give courage to the criminal by leading him to believe that his chances to escape speedy death would be better. In some sections it would not be safe for a white woman to live.

Those of you residing in communities removed from the probability of criminal assaults upon white women can not understand the psychology of these conditions, and you are not competent to legislate upon the question. Your legislation at best, to say nothing of its obvious motive, must of necessity be narrow, political, partisan, and ineffective. The fair-minded men of your party know this is true and admit it.

This bill provides that if you want to lynch a Negro, send four men—not five, because five is a mob. [Laughter.] You reserve to East St. Louis, Chicago, Springfield, and other northern cities the right to have all the race riots they wish. Race riots do not occur in the South. It is most interesting that the author of this bill, the gentleman from St. Louis, is silent on race riots. The bill does not mention the subject. Why not have the bill apply to race riots?

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Louisiana yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. ASWELL. I can not; I have not the time.

You practically say by this bill, let race riots flourish at the will of the local community. If you want to kill Negroes, you must kill them in droves, but if five men kill one Negro, even for the most heinous of all crimes, the five men must go to prison for life, the local law officers, denied their constitutional rights in the local courts, must go to the penitentiary, and the innocent citizens of the county must be taxed to benefit the criminals' family, while the helpless white woman who has suffered agonies ten thousand times worse than death receives from this bill not a suggestion of help or sympathy. [Applause.]

Why not do a far nobler thing now and be enabled to think better of yourselves in the years to come by bringing in a substitute providing that the county shall be taxed whenever the local community permits a criminal assault upon a woman? It would be more to your credit, would be as easily enforced, and would have as much constitutional warrant as this bill has.

If five men punish a criminal you would imprison the five men for life, put the local officers in the penitentiary, and tax the citizens of the county, but you overlook the bomb thrower who strikes at the very foundations of government. Why not tax New York, Chicago, or Washington every time an anarchist throws a bomb in one of these cities to destroy life and property? You would probably require that there be five bomb throwers so it would be a mob. But you say existing law is ample to cover such cases. Well may you also say that existing law and local authorities are steadily reducing lynchings and that this bill would have the contrary effect.

Five bandits killed a merchant in Washington in an effort to rob his store. Would you put all the District policemen in the penitentiary? Such a course would be in harmony with the provisions of this bill.

In Cleveland five bandits robbed a bank. The population of the city turned out en masse and in the struggle one of the bandits was killed by the citizens. Would you put these citizens in the penitentiary, imprison the policemen, and tax the county because this bandit's life was taken without due process of law? Under the operations of this bill, such a course would be necessary.

Why not put the officers of the law in the penitentiary, fine them heavily, and tax the citizens wherever five bandits rob a bank, a mail car, or a post office? The principle is identical with that presented by this bill. But where is your constitutional warrant for the Federal Government to penalize a State or its agency for an act of an individual? The Federal Government finds no constitutional authority even to levy an income tax on the salaries of the officers of any State or its political subdivisions. The proposals in this bill are therefore preposterous.

The newspapers report that the other day in the town of Blanchard, La., Wiley Clarke, with other farmer boys, went to the depot on Sunday morning to see the train come in. Wiley, unarmed and innocent of evil thought, was standing on the station platform near the mail car. A marine under direct control of Federal authorities ordered him to move back, and when he was slow to move, the marine shot him to death. This country boy was deprived of his life without cause and without due process of law. Would you imprison the Federal authorities and tax the citizens of the United States for this unlawful act which was in violation of the fourteenth amendment, or would you first require that there be at least five marines in order to make it a mob?

Gentlemen on the Republican side of the Chamber know the purpose of this bill. Brought in by your leaders, ignoring the delicate race questions involving the western States and those now before the disarmament conference, its purpose is to corral the Negro vote in the next election. You need not admit it. The motive is too patent to require admission. You are trying to satisfy promises your leaders have made the Negro voter, but for which independent Republicans are in no way responsible. The monstrous philosophy proclaimed by your leader that the Negro must have political equality—if he, of course, votes the Republican ticket—while he is rightly denied social equality is an example of your promises.

Every schoolboy knows that full political equality carries with it social equality.

How could a Negro be a member of the President's Cabinet without enjoying social equality? You are eager to jam this bill through the House to please your colored constituencies, but you know it will die in the Senate. You know that if enacted into law it would do harm rather than good, but your business now is to try to fool the Negro voter. Thus to trifle with so important a question and with the constitutional rights of the States is little less than criminal.

But, gentlemen, you fail to recognize that the real black man, the trustworthy, dependable Negro of the South, whose relations with the white man are most sincerely cordial and friendly, has no interest in such legislation as you now present. He is not afraid of mob action or of being lynched. He is in no danger of either, and no one knows this better than he. He knows his white neighbor and friend is ever ready to protect and defend him. He knows that he enjoys equal protection of the laws. It is the criminal Negro and the agitator of the North and East, both black and white, Negroes and white negroettes, that mislead you into grievous error on this sort of ignoble legislation. [Applause.]

Through vicious magazines such as The Defender and The Crisis, actually the worst enemies the Negro race has, these agitators are preaching utterly false and impossible theories which unfortunately are deluding some of our Negro leaders, firing the brain of the ignorant and thus arousing suspicion and unrest. This situation, created by agitators, can be corrected only through kindly relations between the two races. It is out of these kindly relations that the whole racial problem will be solved. It is imperatively important that these ties be actively strengthened by the enlistment of Negroes themselves in preventing crimes that provoke mob violence. To enforce this bill would array the two races against each other, which would mean the extermination of the Negro. Then, gentlemen, for the sake of the Negro race this legislation should be defeated. No informed friend of the Negro will vote for this bill.

The Federal Government tried to force its will on the South, 1865–1875, when she was impoverished, crushed—when the flower of her manhood lay in newly made graves. It was a monstrous failure then. Can it be done now when it attempts to go counter to that age-old instinct that stirs men everywhere to save their womanhood?

Lynching starts as a conflict between primal instincts, one the basest—that of the beast that does not hesitate to sacrifice the fairest of God's creatures to its lust—the other, the noblest instinct of man to protect the female and the weak.

Instinct to protect the female is animal in its origin. It is through the "law of battle" for the female that animals have developed horns, tusks, claws, and other weapons for fighting, and that the males have become larger, stronger, and bolder.

Out of this instinct have grown the finer elements of civilization, all that chivalry means.

Then, when a black brute assaults a neighborhood girl, one we well know, a bright fascinating girl with infinite promise in which we all rejoice, when the brute assaults her, crushes out every spark of her hope into the unspeakable hell, men and boys will rush to the rescue to protect their own women from the peril of the monster at large among them. Swift action by the State court and confidence in the local authorities are the only powers that will restrain men and prevent mob action.

Within the past year in my own district there have occurred two cases of criminal assault upon women. In each case the suffering family and community had confidence in the local court. Within 24 hours after the criminal was apprehended in each case he was indicted and the case called for trial. Within three days he was legaly convicted and sentenced. [Applause.]

If you persist in wishing to interfere with local police control, bring in a bill providing that a woman who has been assaulted shall not be required to appear in court to testify publicly and that upon the apprehension of the criminal the local court shall within 24 hours proceed against him to final judgment. In the event of its failure so to act, severely fine and imprison those responsible for delay. Such a measure could be more easily defended than this bill. Where the people know that the local court will give prompt and exact justice there is no mob action. This end, however, can never be reached from Washington. It must originate in the conscience of the community. The remedy lies in the efficiency of the local court and not in dictation or interference from Washington. The less you meddle the better the government in each community. If you really and sincerely wish to help reduce and not increase the causes that provoke lynchings, strike out the enacting clause of this bill and leave the full responsibility where it properly belongs—upon the local community and the State court.

Since Republican leaders have made pledges to the Negro voter, by all means let them keep their promises faithfully, but let the sincere, independent Republicans and Democrats repeat their manly performance of a few weeks ago, which was heartily approved by the country, when they stood together on the tax bill and defeated the efforts of certain leaders to protect big business at the expense of the average citizen. Let the independent on both sides of the Chamber vote down this vicious proposed legislation.

For the sake of our duty and oath to defend and support the Constitution, for the sake of the dignity of the law and the courts of the States, for the proper information of the criminal, for the sake of law and order in the community, for the protection of society, and, above all, for the sacred protection of the white women of the country, I appeal to you, gentlemen of the House, not to pass this bill and thrust the Federal courts into the local affairs of the States, which would inevitably result in confusion, discontent, turmoil, disaster, and more lynchings. [Great applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANSORGE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. ANSORGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANSORGE. Mr. Speaker, 12,000,000 patriotic, law-abiding, colored Americans and more millions of whites are fervently hoping and praying to-day that the Congress of the United States will enact legislation that will forevermore wipe the stain of lynching from the pages of American history. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, section 1 thereof, provides in part that—

> No State * * * shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Section 5 of the fourteenth amendment gives Congress the power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the amendment.

I respectfully submit the time arrived a long while ago, it has certainly arrived now, for Congress to enforce by appropriate legislation that protection to a large and substantial portion of our citizenship which is guaranteed to it by the fourteenth amendment.

The uncontroverted statistics of known lynchings in the United States for the past 33 years stagger the imagination and shock the senses. The available figures show that in that period 3,432 persons have been lynched, usually by shooting, hanging, or being burned to death, and that of these 2,713 were Negroes and 52 were women. The year 1921 has already claimed 60 victims, of whom 55 were Negroes and 1 a woman. Although lynchings have not been confined to any particular locality, the South has by far the largest percentage. From 1889 to 1918, as stated by the gentleman from Ohio, 2,834 persons were lynched in the South, and of these 386 lynchings took place in Georgia and 375 in Mississippi. All of the 60 lynchings recorded this year occurred in the South. Wherever they take place lynchings are the work of lawless groups and are contrary to the instincts and wishes of the good people of the communities where they occur. Ninety-nine lynchings out of every one hundred are dastardly, cowardly murders where a helpless, defenseless creature is the victim of an infuriated, armed mob with no opportunity to defend himself.

The fact that a large percentage of the victims are Negroes, and that most of the lynchings take place in the South, leads to the conclusion that there exists there an intense prejudice against Negro offenders and a failure to grant or provide them with adequate protection of the laws. The claim will be made here or in the Supreme Court that the colored prisoner in the South gets the same protection as the white prisoner, and that therefore he gets the equal protection of the law as guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. Suppose a farmer has two sons, one six feet tall, who requires five yards of overcoating, and one five feet tall, who requires four yards of overcoating, to protect them from the winter cold. Would the farmer be giving equal protection to the two sons if he gave each of them four yards of overcoating? If Uncle Sam has two harbors, one requiring three forts and the other two to protect them, it is clear that to give each two forts would not be giving equal protection. I maintain that the equal protection of the law means adequate protection, and where by the nature of the crime or the nature of the prisoner, reasonably adequate protection is not given, then the equal protection guaranteed by the Constitution has failed. [Applause.]

In another and more important respect the Negro offender has been denied the equal protection of the laws. In many States lynchings have consistently gone unpunished. They have been tolerated, if not actually encouraged. The purpose of punishment under our system of law and jurisprudence is not revenge, but that it shall act as a deterrent. To have punished the offenders would have prevented many subsequent lynchings. That is the very purpose of this bill—to grant protection by punishing offenders. And that is the principal respect in which many of our States have failed. And by failing to bring to justice the perpetrators of lynchings, clearly have they denied the protection guaranteed by the Constitution. [Applause.]

Lynchings have passed beyond the pale of local significance. A lynching in Georgia has its effect in New York, Boston, Chicago, and St. Louis, and instills in citizens all over the country disregard and contempt for law and order. It has just the opposite effect to that which may have been intended. Lynchings have become national in their influence, and even international, when citizens of foreign countries have been the victims. Congress has appropriated nearly $800,000 for payment to foreign Governments for the murder of their citizens by American mobs.

It is gratifying to note that the South is beginning to realize the broad national aspect of the lynching question.

The Daily Times of Chattanooga, Tenn., commenting upon the lynching of Henry Lowry, on January 26, 1921, at Nodena, Ark., said editorially under the caption, "Barbarism a national crime":

> In such circumstances a great impulse will be given to the movement for a Federal law against this crime. There will be those who, while objecting to Federal interference in purely State affairs will not be long in concluding that there may be a Federal issue in the preservation of the civilization of the Republic. The most ardent State righter will hardly dispute the statement that burning human beings at the stake is barbarous, inhuman, savage, and un-American. The Federal Government may, without offense, declare that such practices are repugnant to the spirit and the soul of the Republic, and that those who indulge them are outlaws and enemies of their country and its institutions. Treason is a national offense, and so may burning human creatures at the stake come to be a crime such as treason. Lynch law run mad, as carried out by this insensate and inhuman mob, is a direct and flagitious assault upon the civilization of the American people and a wanton and unpardonable crime against the moral and spiritual sense of the Nation. The Nation may, therefore, decide that it may, without violating the rights of any State, take cognizance of this pagan savagery and provide a penalty for it so drastic and severe as to render it exceedingly dangerous for future mobs to indulge it.

The burning at the stake of Henry Lowry for the murder of O. T. Craig and his daughter at Nodena, Ark., on December 25, 1920, was one of the most deliberate and gruesome lynchings that has ever been perpetrated. Lowry had the reputation for being a peaceful Negro. It was his second season on the Craig plantation. Newspaper reports state that he was angered because low prices of farm commodities had wiped away his profits. He pursued a Negro woman to the Craig home threatening to shoot her. When Craig stepped to the door to remonstrate with him, Lowry shot him and also killed Mrs. Williamson, his daughter, when she rushed to Craig's side. It was not a rape case, which is often offered as an excuse for lynching, nor was it a lynching in the heat of passion. Lowry was arrested several weeks afterwards at El Paso, Tex. While in the custody of two sheriff's deputies on an interstate train en route to Arkansas for trial, he was seized by a mob in the State of Mississippi and carried by motor through the State of Tennessee to the State of Arkansas. For an actual description of the lynching which took place four weeks and one day after the murders, I read from a signed article in the Memphis (Tenn.) Press of Thursday, January 27, 1921:

> More than 500 persons stood by and looked on while the Negro was slowly burned to a crisp. A few women were scattered among the crowd of Arkansas planters, who directed the gruesome work of avenging the death of O. T. Craig and his daughter, Mrs. C. O. Williamson.
> Not once did the slayer beg for mercy despite the fact that he suffered one of the most horrible deaths imaginable. With the Negro chained to a log, members of the mob placed a small pile of leaves around his feet. Gasoline was then poured on the leaves and the carrying of the death sentence was under way.
> Inch by inch the Negro was fairly cooked to death. Every few minutes fresh leaves were tossed on the funeral pyre until the blaze had passed the Negro's waist. As the flames were eating away his abdomen, a member of the mob stepped forward and saturated the body with gasoline. It was then only a few minutes until the Negro had been reduced to ashes.

The governor of Arkansas branded the lynching of Lowry as "most disgraceful and inexcusable."

He added:

> Inasmuch as the Negro was taken from an interstate train and brought from Mississippi into Arkansas, where he was killed, the matter may come within the purview of Federal authorities, and it is possible that this occurrence may result in the enactment of Federal statutes for the prevention of crimes which should be prevented by our county officers.

The Atlanta Constitution on July 25, 1919, in an extended editorial denouncing a horrible lynching in Telfair County, Ga., concluded:

> This monstrous affair does not concern Telfair County alone but the American Republic as a whole, and we might as well look the future squarely in the face and be prepared to accept Federal jurisdiction in crimes of this kind if our own State has not the courage to meet the situation and apply the remedy.

On the question of the constitutionality of an antilynching law, the Supreme Court of the United States in Ex parte Virginia, One hundredth United States, 339, has held that where a State by its laws or by the acts of its officials does not give to its citizens the equal protection of the laws Congress has the right to pass legislation giving to such citizens the protection guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment. Eminent authorities have been and will be advanced upholding the constitutionality of an antilynching law on this ground, and also upon the broad, general theory of the police power of the Federal Government.

Opinions will undoubtedly be brought forward by the opposition asserting that a Federal antilynching law is unconstitutional. Assuming what I do not concede, that the legal question is a close one, let the Supreme Court of the United States pass upon it as a legal question. If a Federal antilynching law is unconstitutional, the emergency is great enough to warrant an amendment to the Constitution making such law constitutional. But until the Supreme Court says such a law is unconstitutional we would not be justified in attempting the long-drawn-out process of a constitutional amendment.

When President Harding on April 12, 1921, in an address to the extraordinary session of Congress, referred to "national problems far too pressing to be long neglected," he included the statement that Congress should wipe the stain of barbaric lynching from the banners of a free and orderly representative democracy. He stated that one proposal which had merit was the creation of a commission embracing representatives of both races to study and report on the entire subject. But, gentlemen, this matter has passed beyond the state of investigation. The facts are matters of general knowledge. Just as the courts take judicial notice that night follows day and that there are seven days in a week, Congress may take congressional notice of matters of common knowledge without the necessity of an investigating commission. What the President evidently intended was a commission to report on the entire subject, including appropriate legislation to punish and prevent lynching. This I incorporated in a bill (H. R. 4378) which I introduced in the House on April 19, 1921, but which I subordinated and now subordinate to the Dyer bill. It was a second line of attack, ready should the first line fail. The committee, after thorough investigation of the facts and the law, has favorably reported the Dyer bill, and I shall vote for its passage.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSORGE. I will yield later, if my time has not expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. All right.

Mr. ANSORGE. Irrespective of any constitutional question which will eventually be passed upon by the courts, the good people of every community, North and South alike, will welcome Federal intervention to prevent and punish the crime of lynching. The long arm of the Federal Government will reach out and punish the guilty persons without fear and without favor, and many a State official will breathe a sigh of satisfaction that he has been relieved of a nigh impossible duty.

Of the first soldiers of the American Army decorated for bravery in the World War there were two Negroes, Henry Johnson and Needham Roberts, of the Three hundred and sixty-ninth Infantry, formerly the "Fifteenth" of the New York Guard. Four whole Negro regiments, the Three hundred and sixty-ninth, Three hundred and seventieth, Three hundred and seventy-first, and Three hundred and seventy-second, and the first battalion of another Negro regiment, the Three hundred and sixty-seventh, were awarded the croix de guerre for heroism. There were more than 400 individual medals of honor granted to Negroes for bravery in action. Negroes subscribed for $225,000,000 of Liberty bonds.

The Negro is preeminently a God-loving and a God-fearing race. It will be readily seen that the Negro has become inseparably entwined in the life of America.

The opportunity is ours to put an end to the habit of lynching in this country. So long as lynchings are tolerated all the teachings from all the pulpits in all the churches are rank hypocrisy. The colored man shared equally the burdens and responsibilities of citizenship in the World War just won, and he should be guaranteed in practice as well as in print the equal protection of the laws. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANSORGE. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Do I understand the gentleman to contend that this bill was approved by the President?

Mr. ANSORGE. No; I have not said that. The President stated that among the important problems requiring immediate attention this question should be taken up, and he said that a proposal which had merit was the appointment of a joint commission.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Then, do I understand the gentleman to say that his party refused to follow the President when it refused to submit this proposition to a joint commission?

Mr. ANSORGE. No. The President merely said another proposition that had merit was the appointment of a joint commission, and the joint commission, as I understand it, if constituted, was to report on legislation to punish lynching, and we have that legislation here. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Do I understand the gentleman to admit that the Judiciary Committee turned down the President's recommendation with reference to this matter?

Mr. ANSORGE. The President's recommendation was incorporated in a bill which I introduced, and I subordinated that to the Dyer bill.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. So the Republican Party have overruled both you and the President?

Mr. ANSORGE. It has not done so. The Dyer bill was introduced the first day of the special session, and had been reported favorably in the last Congress. The President merely stated that a joint commission had merit; but I do not doubt that the President favors the Dyer bill. He said Congress ought to wipe the stain of lynching from the banners of our Republic. The only way Congress can do it is by legislation.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. So, although you and the President were together on the question of a joint commission, you think he would favor your switching over to this?

Mr. ANSORGE. I did not ask him. I favored the Dyer bill, and introduced my bill merely as a second line of defense.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I think it is perfectly clear that you introduced the bill.

Mr. ANSORGE. It is perfectly clear that I introduced the bill, and it is also perfectly clear that the gentleman from Texas has not been listening to the argument. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. POU. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] is recognized for 20 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the measure the passage of which it is proposed to expedite by this rule is so repugnant in its policy and repulsive in its real effect, whatever its intendment may be, as to render it almost impossible to discuss it in terms of dignity, to say nothing of moderation, and the great difficulty under which the minority are laboring is that we realize in presenting our views upon it that we are presenting them to gentlemen who, however good their intentions may be, are yet lacking in that profound knowledge which can only grow out of personal experience that will enable them properly to deal with the question. We know, of course, that this bill, while general in terms, is leveled for the time being, at least, at a particular section and for a particular cause; but at the same time, my fellow Members, let me warn you with all solemnity that while momentarily we are fighting our own battle, we are fighting a battle which is eventually to be as much for your advantage as for our own. [Applause.] Because, gentlemen, the Constitution of the United States was builded for the ages. You can not destroy that Constitution for a particular purpose and to apply to a particular section without its coming home to every nook and cranny of the Republic in the course of the years upon other questions and other things. [Applause.]

Some months ago, so I have been informed, the majority party in this Congress held a caucus in which you passed upon the question of the reduction of representation of the Southern States. You determined not to make it a party question. You acted with wisdom and with justice. But, Mr. Speaker, in dealing with that question you gentlemen of the majority, after all, were dealing then only with the question of political power. That which was proposed was in its final analysis simply to reduce the political power of certain sections of the country; and whatever may be said of its justice, you might have seemed to have for that some specific and clearly stated constitutional authority. But upon this matter you are not striking at political power, you are striking at the very basis and elements not only of southern but eventually of American civilization and law. [Applause.]

Oh, as I intimated a moment ago, many of you gentlemen do not know what it is to live in a section in which your wife dare not travel alone for a distance of a mile through wood or field. You do not know what it is to raise a daughter amid an environment where from the very time of her reaching the age of 10, so long as she lives, the sword of Damocles hangs over her head. Mr. Speaker, this bill ought to be amended in its title so as to read: "A bill to encourage rape." [Applause.] Whenever you place the idea in the minds of the few beasts who commit these crimes that there is less certainty of their punishment you encourage an attack upon civilized institutions. [Applause.] These inhuman creatures are few as compared with the vast number of the race of their people, 10,000,000 of them. Comparatively few of them are beasts, but there are a few. They do not understand the intricacies and the refinements of the jurisdiction of the respective Governments, State and Federal. They have only a certain hazy idea growing out of the experiences of the last half century that somehow, in some way, the Federal entity may have a more kindly feeling for them than do the States. Whenever you place in the minds of those few the idea that somehow, some way, there will be less risk of punishment to them when they commit these crimes you are but inviting an increase in the commission of these crimes. Now, you may reason about it however much you please. You may go into the intricacies of the refinements of constitutional law. You may seek to strain the timbers of the Constitution, but in the end you will have arrived exactly at that point and no further.

Mr. Speaker, as this discussion shall progress, the constitutional phases of it will be placed before this body, and I beg, as I have never begged before, not alone for our sakes but for the sake of all of the institutions of the country, that you pause and give thought. Upon this and a great many other matters it has seemed to me that we are straining the very timbers of the Constitution—but in none of those acts that have gone before, so much as it is purposed to do now—because this, in my opinion, is a proposition absolutely to destroy the Constitution. In those things in which you have strained the timbers of the Constitution heretofore there has at least always been something good said to be seen ahead. I felt that the maternity bill, so called, was a straining of the Constitution, but there was at least something good attempted to be held up before us. The same may be said of the white slave act. Many of those things were advances and enhancements of the Federal power, but back of them lay at least an alleged motive of preserving health or purity and decency.

Back of this bill the effect, whatever the motive of the authors may be—and they are honorable gentlemen and I shall not question them—is not the production of purity, the enhancement of civilization, the preservation of good feeling between the races, the maintenance of the dignity of law and order, but it is inevitably to be an encouragement to that vilest offense which can be committed against the individual, against the race, anywhere in all the world. No political exigency of course can justify it. Surely you must realize that if you can do this thing, if you can pick out this particular offense and place it within the purview of the Federal Government, denuding the States of their police power to that extent, you can do it for simple murder, you can do it for assault and battery, you can do it for theft, you can do it for every crime or offense, misdemeanor, or felony known to the law. In the development of the processes of the Government, in the social evolvements that are to come out of our mixed races throughout the length and breadth of the land, do you doubt for a single moment that the time is far distant when the demands will come for you to take up the other offenses that I have named, if you by your action extend the Federal power to encompass that of lynching within the States? If you, for the sake of what you conceive to be an immediate and temporary expediency, cut the anchor and set the Constitution adrift, be sure, my fellow Members, it will not stop with the exigency that causes the act, but it will float on and on, a wreck upon an uncharted ocean, until we shall see, and if we do not, our children shall see, the whole fine fabric of this Republic, the greatest Government, said Gladstone, I believe, ever struck off by the hand of man sink into the depths of oblivion and be gone forever from extending its blessings upon the children of men. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, it is with very great reluctance that I attempt to follow such a speech as has just been made by the eloquent gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], and yet there are a few observations which I think should be made before the debate on the rule is brought to a close. Why is it that this rule is brought in at this time? I have served in this House for quite a number of years. At the end of this term it will be 22. Why is it that some time during that period I have never had the privilege of voting upon a measure of this kind? Why is it that at this particular time this particular measure is brought before the House for its consideration? Nobody contends that the bill is going to lessen the crime of lynching even if it becomes a law. I heard several eminent gentlemen discuss the matter before the Committee on Rules, and so far as I recollect not one of them insisted seriously that the Dyer bill would have any material effect in lessening the crime of lynching. Then why bring it in here?

One distinguished gentleman answered the question—a gentleman with whom I served in former Congresses, a gentleman whom I had always placed upon a high pedestal of statesmanship and whom I place there now. He was frank enough to say that this measure was brought before the House in response to a demand of the Republican platform.

Now, it serves no good purpose to beat about the bush. The purpose of this measure is to pretend to pay a political debt, and when you are doing it what is the effect going to be? As my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has so eloquently told the House, we who have been raised in the South know how hard a problem we have to deal with. I speak what every southern man knows to be the simple truth when I make this statement. There is not a mile of highway in the South out of the shadow of somebody's home where a little girl or woman would dare walk unprotected, and no father would any more think of permitting his daughter to walk unprotected than he would permit her to walk into the jaws of death. Now, gentlemen, that is the problem that we have to deal with. We have been doing our best to blot out lynching. God knows we are as much opposed to it as you are. There is just one way to blot out forever the crime of lynching. At least there is one way to make the crime one of very rare occurrence. That way is for the colored race to blot out forever the crime of the raping of white women by Negro men. I say this deliberately. The colored race has it within its power to stop lynching, if it will. Instead of concealing the brute who has committed this crime let them aid the officers of the law in apprehending him. I do not mean that the race as a whole conceals the criminal, but I do say there are too many good men of the race who refrain from helping the officers of the law. There is one other thing that you men from the North can not comprehend, that ineffable, indescribable, unspeakable love that every southern man feels for the old black nurse who took care of him in childhood. [Applause.] I was three years old while my father was at the front in the Civil War. My brother was five. The sweetest memories of my life go back to my old "mammy" who faithfully and tenderly took care of my brother and myself during those days when my mother and her two small sons were at the mercy of the colored race. You gentlemen can not comprehend the love and the tenderness that we feel for those black people who cared for us. I would to God that I had it in my power to change the attitude of the high-class Negro men and women toward the beasts who commit the crime of rape. In the course of time I have no doubt that attitude will be changed. Whenever the kindly, honest Negro man decrees that rape must cease, you will not need any antilynching bills.

How is this law going to be construed? How do you think the black beast who commits an atrocious crime, or the white beast who commits such a crime, is going to construe the law? They are going to construe it not as a punishment for some unspeakable offense, but as an excuse or apology for it. Gentlemen, you could not do a greater hurt, in my humble judgment, to this Republic than to pass this law. I speak not as a southern man. I speak not as a North Carolinian. No man loves that flag more than I do. There is a halo around it which quickens every sentiment of love in my heart. I speak as one who loves his country, every inch of it; I speak as an American; and I tell you, in my humble judgment, the worst thing you can do is to report this rule and pass this bill. The best thing that you could do is to consign this legislation to oblivion, and leave the southern people, in the fear of God, and with the best intentions, to work out this problem as best they can, to the interest of the black man and the white man alike. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas rose.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for one minute?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Certainly.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN].

Mr. MCSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of putting in an argument on the legal aspects of the question which was written some 60 days ago in the calm of my study, in the belief that it may be of some assistance to those who shall be pursuing this inquiry in the next few days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MCSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, this effort to pass this antilynching bill is an assault upon the last defensive ditch around the citadel of State's rights. Though the Supreme Court has often told us that ours is "an indestructible Union of indestructible States," yet we see the process of consolidation and centralization go on step by step till destruction of State sovereignty in any respect is well-nigh complete.

Men forget ours is a Federal system, and that the Federal Government has limited powers. This Federal system has made us great as a Nation, because it made possible the free play of local self-government and made it easy to respect the rights and protect the interests of minorities.

Of course, we recognize that the extent of State powers is being constantly reduced by constitutional amendments enlarging Federal powers. But within the sphere of powers left to the States they are as independent and sovereign as ever. Both State and Federal Governments are sovereign within their respective spheres.

Is lawlessness, miscarriage of justice, and neglect of official duty any reason to destroy the autonomy and independence of a people? If so, judging by the figures produced to induce Congress to create 23 new Federal judgeships, then the Federal Government stands convicted by its neglect, inaction, and passivity by reason of crowded dockets and untried cases of self-surrender of sovereign power.

The attempt to penalize a county in which a lynching occurs is clearly destructive of our Federal system. It has been held from the great decision in McCullough v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 316), decided 1819, that neither State nor Federal Government can impose any duty or obligation upon each other, because the power to burden or control involves the power to destroy.

Now, the county is the creature and agency of the State and is itself immune from suit or liability, just as the State is, except as the State by statute has made the county liable and sueable. Therefore if the Federal Government can impose a penalty upon a county, then it could also penalize a State. If it could make a county liable to a $10,000 penalty it could impose a $10,000,000 penalty upon a State. Thus a State could be destroyed and all her agencies paralyzed.

And by the same logic the proposition to impose a Federal penalty upon a State officer, such as sheriff, would be making that officer answerable to a government other than that under which he holds his commission. To control its officer is to control the State; to place an officer in a Federal prison for life would destroy an essential agency of a State.

All lawlessness originates from disregard for law. The lawmaking body of the American Congress should set all private citizens the example of sincere respect for the highest law in the land, the Federal Constitution. If we contemptuously ignore it as a worn-out scrap of paper, then we sow the dragon's teeth of disorder. If we violate the Constitution and thereby violate our oaths in order to punish citizens for lynching each other, then we become a mob determined to lynch the supreme law of the land itself.

It is admitted by all that the fourteenth amendment inhibits a State to deny to any person due process of law and equal protection of the laws. But it is urged that acts by its judicial, legislative, or executive officer. It is said that the act of such officer is the act of the State. Then it could just as logically be urged that Congress may pass a law subjecting to severe penalties all members of a State legislature that may pass a law held by a Federal court to deny due process of law and equal protection of the law. So the judge of a State court who rendered a decision held by a Federal court to deny due process of law and equal protection of the law would be liable to prosecution and imprisonment.

The result is obvious. The State would die. Then, you may ask, are these parts of the fourteenth amendment futile? Surely not. The Supreme Court plainly says the remedy is corrective, prospective. To set at naught all acts and deeds and decisions is violation of due process and equal protection.

Each star in the blue field of Old Glory has ever represented a sovereign State. Enact this antilynching bill and with one full blow we dash every star to the dust. The sovereign States are gone. True, there will remain the same soil and the same sky above, but all else is changed. We will have broken from a glorious past. Local self-government will cease to be a fact. The rights of vast minorities will not and can not be respected. A vast horde of appointive officers, not elected by the people over whom they exercise power but holding office as a reward for party and partisan zeal, will swarm over the land annoying and oppressing the people.

WOULD SUCH A LAW BE CONSTITUTIONAL?

It is urged that Congress has power under the fourteenth amendment to pass this so-called antilynching bill. I propose to discuss this constitutional question. That question meets us at the beginning, and before we can consider the wisdom or unwisdom, the expediency or suitability of the proposed legislation. Every Member of Congress takes an oath to "support and defend the Constitution of the United States," and there rests as great if not greater obligation on the legislator in Congress to understand and conform his action to the Constitution than rests upon any court. Why? Because when the court comes to consider the question of the constitutionality of an act of Congress it begins by assuming its constitutionality, assuming the Members of Congress have done their duties under their oaths, and resolving every reasonable doubt in favor of constitutionality.

The rule of construction is simple. The Constitution itself by the tenth amendment prescribes the rule for its own interpretation. It is that all powers not expressly conferred and not necessarily implied in aid of express powers, are reserved to the States. The Supreme Court and all subordinate courts still respect and enforce this rule of interpretation. In the very recent case of Newberry against the United States, decided May 2, 1921, the Supreme Court denied that Congress has any power to regulate the conduct of candidates in primary elections in the States for United States Senator. That decision was logically inevitable. The court in that decision uses this language:

> It should not be forgotten that, exercising inherent police power, the State may suppress whatever evils may be incident to primary or convention.

So the States must suppress the evils of lawlessness and lynchings. The evils are manifest and terrible. There are thousands of evils of immorality and violence which the States alone have jurisdiction over. The obligations of the eighteenth amendment alone are overcrowding the Federal courts.

In the case of Keller v. United States (213 U. S., 138), the Supreme Court held that the Federal Government has no police power, and that the police power is reserved to the States, which alone could punish a person keeping a house of ill fame in a State, even when the female inmates are aliens and in this country less than three years. The court approved again of Judge Cooley's statement that "the power to establish the ordinary police regulations (i. e., suppressing crime and violence—insert mine), has been left with the individual States and can not be assumed by the National Government." The court approves of the language in Barbier v. Connolly (113 U. S., 27), as follows:

> But neither the amendment—broad and comprehensive as it is—nor any other amendment was designed to interfere with the power of the State, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the State, develop its resources, and add to its wealth and prosperity.

Further, it approved of Chief Justice Marshall's fundamental proposition in McCullough v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 316):

> This Government (National Government) is acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers.

Then, at page 148 (213 U. S.), the court concludes:

> And the legislation must stand or fall according to the determination of the question of the power of Congress to control generally dealings of citizens with aliens.

In other words, an immense body of legislation which heretofore has been recognized as peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the States may be taken by Congress away from them. Although Congress has not largely entered into this field of legislation, it may do so if it has the power. Then we should be brought face to face with such a change in the internal conditions of this country as was never dreamed of by the framers of the Constitution. While the acts of Congress are to be liberally construed in order to enable it to carry into effect the powers conferred, it is equally true that prohibitions and limitations upon those powers should also be fairly and reasonably enforced. (Fairbank v. United States, 181 U. S., 283.) To exaggerate in the one direction and restrict in the other will tend to substitute one consolidated government for the present Federal system. We should never forget the declaration in Texas v. White, 7 Wallace, pages 700, 725, that—> the Constitution, in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible Union composed of indestructible States.

If a State denies equal protection of the law, Congress may by law correct and render nugatory such attempted inequality.

When does a State deny equality?

First. By unequal, unfair, discriminatory legislation. None such is charged to exist in any State.

Second. By unequal, unfair, discriminatory judicial decisions, whereby a different and distinct rule of law is applied to certain groups or classes of citizens. None such is charged to exist in any State.

Third. By unequal, unfair, discriminatory administration of executive power. Here it is charged that certain executive officers of the State, such as some sheriffs and their deputies, have culpably failed to protect their prisoners from lawless mobs and have failed culpably to apprehend and bring to trial the members of such lawless mobs. It has not been charged that all the sheriffs in the State have habitually failed in these respects. At most it is an occasional and very exceptional fact. Compared with the whole number of crimes and lawful convictions and executions, the number of lynchings is small.

It must be admitted that the laws of all States require arresting officers to protect their prisoners. In like manner under the laws of all States every participant in a lynching is a murderer. Can it be fairly said that because an officer occasionally fails in his duty to protect his prisoner from lawless mobs that such exceptional act amounts to the action of the State as a subdivision of organized society in denying due process of law and in denying equal protection of law?

Legislatures of States frequently pass acts so discriminatory and unfair that the Supreme Court of the United States in due season declares the same to be unconstitutional, null, and void. Can we imagine that any sane man would propose an act of Congress to penalize and punish members of a State legislature enacting statutes in violation of the due process and equal protection clauses of the fourteenth amendment? Can we believe that any Member of Congress will suggest legislation to punish in a Federal court such judges of State courts as render decisions subsequently held by a higher court to deny due process of law or equal protection of the law?

And yet, the thought of Federal laws to punish State legislators and State judges for denying due process of law and equal protection of the law is just as logical, just as reasonable, and just as competent constitutionally as the idea of a Federal law to punish State executives, whether governor, sheriff, or policeman, for failure to protect a prisoner from a lawless mob. There is no escape from the logic.

If Congress can by law provide punishment in a Federal court for a State sheriff for his acts or neglect of action as sheriff, then Congress could provide punishment for the governor of a State for his acts or failure to act as the State's chief executive. And if the State's executive officers may be punished by fine or imprisonment under congressional laws, so may the chief justice and all judges of the State. And by the same token the members of the State legislatures may be punished for enacting laws found to be violative of the fourteenth amendment. There is no escape from these logical deductions, and they are the reductio ad absurdum of the proposed legislation.

THE FUNDAMENTAL FALLACY.

Then where is the fallacy in the argument of the proponents of the antilynching bill? The fallacy is found in the paraphrase of Chief Justice Marshall's language in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 202), found on page 9 of the committee report. It is there assumed that Congress has affirmative power to provide equal protection of the laws to all citizens merely because the States are prohibited from denying equal protection of the law to any person. It is argued that Congress is given power to do a thing merely because the power to do that thing is denied to the States. A denial of power to the States is surely not a donation of the same power to the Congress. A power to enforce by appropriate legislation a denial of equal protection of law by the States is not exercised by forestalling all State action by comprehensive regulatory action by Congress.

THE ONLY CASE EXPLAINED.

There is only one case that seems to afford any basis for the argument of proponents of the bill (the case of Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S., 339), while there are many cases clearly construing the fourteenth amendment so as to deny the constitutionality of the bill, among such contrary cases being United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542); United States v. Harris (106 U. S., 629); Civil Rights cases (109 U. S., 3); Hodges v. U. S. (203 U. S., 1); Keller v. United States (213 U. S., 138); In re Rahrer (140 U. S., 554).

The one case (Ex parte Virginia, supra) relied on by the proponents of the bill, when properly understood, is not out of harmony with the great current of decisions. The case was decided upon the mere averments of an indictment which alleged that J. D. Coles, as county judge, was legally charged with the duty of selecting grand and petit jurors, and that he excluded from the jury list certain citizens possessing all qualifications as jurors prescribed by law and such exclusion was because of the race, color, and previous condition of servitude of the persons so excluded. Here it was admitted, for the argument, that the State's officer excluded all of a certain class, to wit, all Negroes, from the jury lists upon the sole ground that they were Negroes. Such action was class discrimination. All Negroes were purposely excluded because of race and color, and not an occasional Negro excluded for real or fanciful reasons of personal unfitness. Such consistent exclusion of Negroes amounted to a rule of action. Since law is but a rule of action, the result was that the law of Virginia denied to Negroes the right of sitting on juries, and such class discrimination was a manifest denial of the equal protection of the law.

So, to make direct application of the true doctrine of the case, if it could be fairly charged that in any State all Negro prisoners charged with murder, arson, or rape are lynched, then the case might be authority for certain legislation. But, in fact, persons both black and white are lynched in all parts of the country; but wherever done the lynching is not against a class or race or sect. It is because of the particular crime by the particular person. Lex talionis is invoked against individuals because of personal offenses, and not against classes and groups as a fixed rule of action in all such cases.

In a certain sense, when one person assaults or kills another, he deprives that other person of his rights "without due process of law" and denies to him the "equal protection of the law." But not in the sense of the fourteenth amendment. Such acts by individuals are mere crimes. Crimes may be committed by one person or many persons. In the latter case all are guilty as principals. A State is not denying "due process of law" and "equal protection of the law," because, unfortunately, crimes are committed. Crimes are committed in all the States and in all States some criminals go unwhipped of justice. Do all the States thereby deny "equal protection of the laws" to their citizens? Some crimes occur more frequently in some States than in others and at some periods of time than at others.

We can not be assured that if the Federal Government were to take over lawmaking and law enforcement in all the States thereby crimes would cease or even all criminals be detected and punished. The solemn facts are to the contrary. The Federal Government wields no magic, talismanic wan to deter or punish all criminals. Our Federal courts are overcrowded with criminal cases, and Congress has been urged to create 23 additional Federal judgeships to relieve the congestion of Federal criminal cases. Does anyone argue that merely because Federal laws are violated then the Federal Government has failed in its duty to protect its citizens and as such is denying its citizens "the equal protection of the law"?

POWERS AND PROHIBITIONS DISTINGUISHED.

There is a very clear and obvious distinction between an affirmative constitutional power conferring authority upon Congress to exercise certain governmental functions, as to regulate interstate commerce or coin money or raise an army and navy; and, on the contrary, a mere denial of power to a State, such as no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

CIVIL RIGHTS CASES DECISIONS.

The complete and final interpretation was placed on that part of the fourteenth amendment now under consideration—due process of law and equal protection of the law clauses—by the United States Supreme Court after most mature consideration in five cases decided together in United States v. Stanley et al (109 U. S., 3). I extract from that decision the following language, so broad and comprehensible as to be unmistakable:

> The first section of the fourteenth amendment (which is the one relied on), after declaring who shall be citizens of the United States and of the several States, is prohibitory in its character and prohibitory upon the States. It declares that "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of every kind, which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States or which injures them in life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the laws. It not only does this, but, in order that the national will thus declared may not be a mere brutum fulmen the last section of the amendment invests Congress with power to enforce it with appropriate legislation. To enforce what? To enforce the prohibition. To adopt appropriate legislation for correcting the effects of such prohibited State laws and State acts and thus to render them effectually null, void, and innocuous.

This is the legislative power conferred upon Congress, and this is the whole of it. It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation, but to provide modes of relief against State legislation or State action of the kind referred to. It does not authorize Congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulation of private right, but to provide modes of redress against the operation of State laws and the action of State officers, executive or judicial, when these are subversive of the fundamental rights specified in the amendment. Positive rights and privileges are undoubtedly secured by the fourteenth amendment, but they are secured by way of prohibition against State laws and State proceedings affecting those rights and privileges and by power given to Congress to legislate for the purpose of carrying such prohibition into effect, and such legislation must necessarily be predicated upon such supposed State laws or State proceedings and be directed to the correction of their operation and effect. A quite full discussion of this aspect of the amendment may be found in United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542), Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313), and Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S., 339).

An apt illustration of this distinction may be found in some of the provisions of the original Constitution. Take the subject of contracts, for example: The Constitution prohibited the States from passing any laws impairing the obligation of contracts. This did not give Congress power to provide laws for the general enforcement of contracts, nor power to invest the courts of the United States with jurisdiction over contracts, so as to enable parties to sue on them in those courts. It did, however, give the power to provide remedies by which the impairment of contracts by State legislation might be counteracted and corrected, and this power was exercised. The remedy which Congress actually provided was that contained in the twenty-fifth section of the judiciary act of 1789, First Statutes, page 85, giving to the Supreme Court of the United States jurisdiction by writ of error to review the final decisions of State courts whenever they should sustain the validity of a State statute or authority alleged to be repugnant to the Constitution or the laws of the United States. By this means, if a State law was passed impairing the obligation of a contract and the State tribunals sustained the validity of the law, the mischief could be corrected in this court. The legislation of Congress and the proceedings provided for under it were corrective in their character. No attempt was made to draw into the United States courts the litigation of contracts generally, and no such attempt would have been sustained. We do not say that the remedy provided for was the only one that might have been provided for in that case. Probably Congress had the power to pass a law giving to the courts of the United States direct jurisdiction over contracts alleged to be impaired by a State law; and under the broad provisions of the act of March 3, 1875, chapter 137, Eighteenth Statutes, page 470, giving to the circuit courts jurisdiction of all cases arising under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, it is possible that such jurisdiction now exists. But under that or any other law it must appear as well by allegation as proof at the trial that the Constitution had been violated by the action of the State legislature. Some obnoxious State law passed, or that might be passed, is necessary to be assumed in order to lay the foundation of any Federal remedy in the case, and for the very sufficient reason that the constitutional prohibition is against State laws impairing the obligation of contracts.

And so in the present case, until some State law has been passed, or some State action through its officers or agents has been taken, adverse to the rights of citizens sought to be protected by the fourteenth amendment no legislation of the United States under said amendment, nor any proceedings under such legislation, can be called into activity, for the prohibitions of the amendment are against State laws and acts done under State authority.

Of course, legislation may, and should be, provided in advance to meet the exigency when it arises; but it should be adapted to the mischief and wrong which the amendment was intended to provide against; and that is, State laws or State action of some kind, adverse to the rights of the citizen secured by the amendment. Such legislation can not properly cover the whole domain of rights appertaining to life, liberty, and property, defining them and providing for their vindication. That would be to establish a code of municipal law regulative of all private rights between man and man in society. It would be to make Congress take the place of the State legislatures and to supersede them. It is absurd to affirm that, because the rights of life, liberty, and property—which include all civil rights that men have—are by the amendment sought to be protected against invasion by the State without due process of law, Congress may therefore provide due process of law for their vindication in every case; and that, because the denial by a State to any persons, of the equal protection of the laws, is prohibited by the amendment, therefore Congress may establish laws for their equal protection. In fine, the legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt in this behalf is not general legislation upon the rights of the citizen, but corrective legislation; that is, such as may be necessary and proper for counteracting such laws as the States may adopt or enforce, and which, by the amendment they are prohibited from making or enforcing, or such acts and proceedings as the State may commit or take, and which, by the amendment they are prohibited from committing or taking. It is not necessary for us to state, if we could, what legislation would be proper for Congress to adopt. It is sufficient for us to examine whether the law in question is of that character.

An inspection of the law shows that it makes no reference whatever to any supposed or apprehended violation of the fourteenth amendment on the part of the States. It is not predicated on any such view. It proceeds ex directo to declare that certain acts committed by individuals shall be deemed offences, and shall be prosecuted and punished by proceedings in the courts of the United States. It does not profess to be corrective of any constitutional wrong committed by the States; it does not make its operation to depend upon any such wrong committed. It applies equally to States which have the justest laws respecting the personal rights of citizens, and whose authorities are ever ready to enforce such laws, as to those which arise in States that may have violated the prohibition of the amendment. In other words, it steps into the domain of local jurisprudence, and lays down rules for the conduct of individuals in society toward each other, and imposes sanctions for the enforcement of those rules, without referring in any manner to any supposed action of the State or its authorities.

If this legislation is appropriate for enforcing the prohibitions of the amendment, it is difficult to see where it is to stop. Why may not Congress with equal show of authority enact a code of laws for the enforcement and vindication of all rights of life, liberty, and property? If it is supposable that the States will deprive persons of life, liberty, and property without due process of law—and the amendment itself does suppose this—why should not Congress proceed at once to precribe due process of law for the protection of every one of these fundamental rights, in every possible case, as well as to prescribe equal privileges in inns, public conveyances, and theaters? The truth is, that the implication of a power to legislate in this manner is based upon the assumption that if the States are forbidden to legislate or act in a particular way on a particular subject, and power is conferred upon Congress to enforce the prohibition, this gives Congress power to legislate generally upon that subject, and not merely power to provide modes of redress against such State legislation or action. The assumption is certainly unsound. It is repugnant to the tenth amendment of the Constitution, which declares that powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, not prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

ACTS OF INDIVIDUALS ARE NOT ACTS OF THE STATE.

In this connection it is proper to state that civil rights, such as are guaranteed by the Constitution against State aggression, can not be impaired by the wrongful acts of individuals, unsupported by State authority in the shape of laws, customs, or judicial or executive proceedings. The wrongful act of an individual, unsupported by any such authority, is simply a private wrong or a crime of that individual; an invasion of the rights of the injured party, it is true, whether they affect his person, his property, or his reputation; but if not sanctioned in some way by the State, or not done under State authority, his rights remain in full force, and may presumably be vindicated by resort to the laws of the State for redress. An individual can not deprive a man of his right to vote, to hold property, to buy and sell, to sue in the courts, or to be a witness or a juror; he may, by force or fraud, interfere with the enjoyment of the right in a particular case; he may commit an assault against the person, or commit murder, or use ruffian violence at the polls, or slander the good name of a fellow citizen; but, unless protected in these wrongful acts by some shield of State law or State authority, he can not destroy or injure the right; he will only render himself amenable to satisfaction of punishment, and amenable therefor to the laws of the State where the wrongful acts are committed. Hence, in all those cases where the Constitution seeks to protect the rights of the citizen against discriminative and unjust laws of the State by prohibiting such laws, it is not individual offenses but abrogation and denial of rights which it denounces, and for which it clothes the Congress with power to provide a remedy. This abrogation and denial of rights for which the States alone were or could be responsible was the great seminal and fundamental wrong which was intended to be remedied. And the remedy to be provided must necessarily be predicated upon that wrong. It must assume that in the cases provided for the evil or wrong actually committed rests upon some State law or State authority for its excuse and perpetration.

Of course these remarks do not apply to those cases in which Congress is clothed with direct and plenary powers of legislation over the whole subject, accompanied with an express or implied denial of such power to the States as in the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes, the coining of money, the establishment of post offices and post roads, the declaring of war, and so forth. In these cases Congress has power to pass laws for regulating the subject specified in every detail, and the conduct and transactions of individuals in respect thereof. But where a subject is not submitted to the general legislative power of Congress, but it is only submitted thereto for the purpose of rendering effective some prohibition against particular State legislation or State action in reference to that subject, the power given is limited by its object and any legislation by Congress in the matter must necessarily be corrective in its character, adapted to counteract and redress the operation of such prohibited State laws or proceedings of State officers.

If the principles of interpretation which we have laid down are correct, as we deem them to be—and they are in accord with the principles laid down in the cases before referred to, as well as in the recent case of United States v. Harris (106 U. S., 629)—it is clear that the law in question can not be sustained by any grant of legislative power made to Congress by the fourteenth amendment. That amendment prohibits the States from denying to any person the equal protection of the laws and declares that Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the amendment.

The law in question, without any reference to adverse State legislation on the subject, declares that all persons shall be entitled to equal accommodations and privileges in inns, public conveyances, and places of public amusement, and imposes a penalty upon any individual who shall deny to any citizen such equal accommodations and privileges. This is not corrective legislation; it is primary and direct; it takes immediate and absolute possession of the subject of the right to admission to inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement. It supercedes and displaces State legislation on the same subject, or only allows it permissive force. It ignores such legislation, and assumes that the matter is one that belongs to the domain of national regulation. Whether it would not have been a more effective protection of the rights of citizens to have clothed Congress with plenary power over the whole subject is not now the question. What we have to decide is, whether such plenary power has been conferred upon Congress by the fourteenth amendment; and our judgment is, it has not.

PURPOSE OF FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

In United States v. Harris (106 U. S., 638) we find this exposition of the purpose and effect of the "due process of law" and "equal protection of law" clauses of the fourteenth amendment:

The purpose and effect of the two sections of the fourteenth amendment above quoted were clearly defined by Mr. Justice Bradley, in the case of United States v. Cruikshank (1 Woods, 308), as follows: "It is a guaranty against the acts of the State government itself. It is a guaranty against the exertion of arbitrary and tyrannical power on the part of the government and legislature of the State, not a guaranty against the commission of individual offenses; and the power of Congress, whether express or implied, to legislate for the enforcement of such a guaranty does not extend to the passage of laws for the suppression of crime within the States. The enforcement of the guaranty does not require or authorize Congress to perform the duty that the guaranty itself supposes it to be the duty of the State to perform, and which it requires the State to perform."

When the case of United States v. Cruikshank came to this court, the same view was taken here. The Chief Justice delivering the opinion of the court in that case said:

The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or from denying to any person the equal protection of the law; but this provision does not add anything to the rights of one citizen as against another. It simply furnishes an additional guarantee against any encroachment by the State upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society. The duty of protecting all its citizens in the enjoyment of an equality of rights was originally assumed by the States, and it remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, and no more. The power of the National Government is limited to this guarantee (92 U. S., 542).

So in Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313) it was declared by this court, speaking by Mr. Justice Strong, that—these provisions of the fourteenth amendment have reference to State action exclusively, and not to any action of private individuals.

These authorities show conclusively that the legislation under consideration finds no warrant for its enactment in the fourteenth amendment.

The language of the amendment does not leave this subject in doubt:

When the State has been guilty of no violation of its provisions; when it has not made or enforced any law abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; when no one of its departments has deprived any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or denied any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; when, on the contrary, the laws of the State, as enacted by its legislature, and construed by its judicial and administered by its executive departments, recognize and protect the rights of all persons, the amendment imposes no duty and confers no power upon Congress.

Again at page 643:

A private person can not make constitutions or laws, nor can he with authority construe them, nor can he administer or execute them. The only way, therefore, in which one private person can deprive another of the equal protection of the laws is by the commission of some offense against the laws which protect the rights of persons, as by theft, burglary, arson, libel, assault, or murder. If, therefore, we hold that section 5519 is warranted by the thirteenth amendment, we should by virtue of that amendment accord to Congress the power to punish every crime by which the right of any person to life, property, or reputation is invaded. Thus under a provision of the Constitution which simply abolished slavery and involuntary servitude, we should, with few exceptions, invest Congress with power over the whole catalogue of crimes. A construction of the amendment which leads to such a result is clearly unsound.

So from United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 554–555) we extract the following exposition of the fourteenth amendment:

The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but this provision does not, any more than the one which precedes it, and which we have just considered, add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of this guaranty.

HOW CAN PASSIVITY BE ACTIVITY?

The argument for the bill is based on "negativity," "negative action," "negative affirmation." By this strange logic inaction becomes action, failure becomes accomplishment, absence becomes presence, innocence becomes guilt. Admittedly the power of Congress is confined to correcting action of the State—legislative action, judicial action, or executive action—in denying to any person the "equal protection of the law."

The fourteenth amendment did not change the Federal character of our General Government nor give Congress power to legislate about the details of "due process of law" and "equal protection of law." In McPherson v. Blacker (146 U. S., 39) the court announced these propositions:

The object of the fourteenth amendment in respect of citizenship was to preserve equality of rights and to prevent discriminations as between citizens, but not to radically change the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Governments to each other, and of both governments to the people. (In re Kemmler, 136 U. S., 436.)

The inhibition that no State shall deprive any person within its jurisdiction of the equal protection of the laws was designed to prevent any person or class of persons from being singled out as a special subject for discriminating and hostile legislation. (Pembina Co. v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S., 181, 188.)

In Hayes v. Missouri (120 U. S., 68, 71) Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, said:

The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States does not prohibit legislation which is limited either in the objects to which it is directed or by the territory within which it is to operate. It merely requires that all persons subjected to such legislation shall be treated alike, under like circumstances and conditions, both in the privileges conferred and in the liabilities imposed. As we said in Barbier v. Connolly, speaking of the fourteenth amendment: "Class legislation, discriminating against some and favoring others, is prohibited; but legislation which in carrying out a public purpose is limited in its application, if within the sphere of its operation it affects alike all persons similarly situated, is not within the amendment." (113 U. S., 237.)

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with a very important question here this afternoon. None of greater importance has engaged the attention of the Congress. It has been stated during the discussion that 3,500 lynchings have occurred in the United States in the last 30 years. Mob law, or the mob to that extent, has taken the place of the law. If our Government means anything, or if it is to mean anything, it is a government of law in which all citizens are entitled to the equal protection of the law. No guaranty of the Constitution of the United States is more sacred than that which extends the equal protection of the law to every citizen. We are this afternoon launching a discussion of a bill that has for its object extending equal protection of the law to all of our people. There are grave questions involved in the bill. That is the reason that much time has been provided by the rule for its consideration. I sincerely hope that in the time allowed for the discussion of this bill it shall receive the calm, dispassionate discussion to which its importance entitles it. This matter should not be disposed of on appeals to passion, on half-stated truths. Much has been said here to the effect that this bill is brought out at this time because of political exigencies that it is alleged confront the administration and the Republican Party in connection with it. Gentlemen, the discussion in opposition to this bill discloses the political advantage that would be taken of a bill that would extend the guaranties of the Constitution to every citizen of the Republic. It has not been my practice, and it is not now my purpose, to discuss sectional matters in our country, but it can not be overlooked at this moment, in the light of the discussion that has taken place in opposition to this bill this afternoon, that there is a section of this country in which a political party has been held together because of the existence of the Negro in the South.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Appeals to the passion of the white people of the South to deny them the right to think upon political questions aside from the relations of the Negro as a citizen——

I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman anticipate that the passage of this bill is likely to remove that political solidarity?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Not at all. On the other hand, I concede that the speeches made here this afternoon are but a sample of those that will be delivered from every rostrum in the South in the next and ensuing campaign. Now, I approach the unfair assumption indulged in by the opposition in connection with the necessity for the enactment of this bill into law. It has been assumed in opposition to it that all the lynchings that have occurred have been to avenge the crime of rape.

Let me for a moment, in this connection call attention to what has been unfairly presented in this argument to-day. The governor of Georgia, on the 22d of April of this year presented a report in which he calls attention to the fact that in the past two years in that State 135 cases of violence to the persons of Negroes had taken place. Now, you gentlemen who have made up your mind to discuss this matter upon every stump in the next campaign will say these unlawful mobs that attack the Negroes were protecting the white women of the South. The governor of Georgia says that but two of the 135 cases were cases either of assault or attempted assault upon white women.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Does the gentleman know that after the governor of Georgia made that statement and investigations were made of the alleged cases, that the governor was kept busy apologizing and correcting the errors made in that statement?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The apologies are not in his report.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will state to the gentleman in fairness that that is the fact; that the governor afterwards apologized for several inaccuracies in his satement enumerating the cases in that report. He issued a public statement.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not know what the governor of Georgia afterwards stated, but I think it is strange, unusually strange, that gentlemen should assume in this debate before the House of Representatives and the country that rape has been the cause of all the lynchings that have occurred. The governor of Georgia has not apologized for saying, because he enumerated cases giving the date and the circumstances which resulted in the lynching of Negroes over some dispute as to wages between them and their employers, over disputes as to the length of time that they were to work out an account, or as to whether the amount had been worked out. More than half the unlawful attacks upon Negroes reported by the governor of Georgia referred rather to disputes affecting the commercial relations of the Negro with his white neighbor or white employer rather than cases of attempted assault or even of speaking to a white woman. Mr. Speaker, there can be no greater crime than that of rape. It is so abhorrent and so revolting to think of that it is not easy to discuss it at all. Under the law, I can think of no punishment that is equal to it, but it should be punished as other heinous crimes are punished, by due process of the law. The punishment should be swift under the law. It should be as nearly equal to the crime as it is possible to make it, under the law.

There has been growth in the South in stopping lynching. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] gave a picture of the horrors that shadow every path in the South that would be trodden by a white woman. Lynchings in 30 years have not apparently wiped out this awful crime. I wish something could wipe it out. The Negroes owe it to themselves to raise the moral growth of all their people above the commission of that crime. Everything should be done to encourage them to respect the moralities of life and the solemnity of the law. I submit to you that the crime of rape, which is the most awful crime that can be committed, can not be atoned for and can not be adequately punished and can not be wiped out by lynching. It has been tried for 30 years. Let us try something else. Let us stop lynching and attempt to wipe out rape by some other methods. Let the white people of the United States set an example of obedience to law and observance of the law and observance of the rights of men everywhere, rich and poor, black and white, wherever they exist. Let them have the equal protection of the law. Then let the colored race and the white race appeal to all to rise above this awful crime that has been committed, though not committed to the extent that the arguments against this bill have assumed.

You place your opposition to the bill upon the idea that lynching is justified in order to avenge the crime of rape, when only 19 per cent of the 3,500 lynchings that have occurred in the United States in the last 30 years have been for the crime of rape.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to have the benefit of the gentleman's opinion as to why lynchings would be minimized or decreased by the mere conferring on the Federal court the jurisdiction to try men who are charged with them, in view of the fact that the judges are local judges and the men who try these criminals are actuated possibly by the same sentiment on this question that a State jury would be.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am not sure that it would, but we extended under the eighteenth amendment the jurisdiction of the Federal court and the laws of the United States into every State, county, village, and hamlet of the country to prevent the crime of selling liquor, and the gentleman from Alabama was one of the hearty proponents of that constitutional amendment and the law in its support. And I assume it was because he thought, as I thought, that the Federal authority would have a greater deterrent effect in the communities than would the local authorities.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If I thought that, I made a mighty bad guess.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In any event, we were together on that thing all the way through. We may have made a mistake.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a question.

Mr. UPSHAW. I would ask the gentleman——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Just for a question.

Mr. UPSHAW. Does not the gentleman recognize, to put it in the form of a question, that this extension of the Federal law into the States followed the adoption of a constitutional amendment? There has not been a constitutional amendment on this question.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution guarantees to every citizen of this Republic the equal protection of the law.

Mr. COCKRAN. I just want to ask the gentleman this question: If he is entirely accurate in stating that anybody on this side delivered an address, or made a suggestion, defending lynching on any ground or for any reason?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No.

Mr. COCKRAN. I thought you said that. I wanted you to have a chance to correct it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; I said that it was the implication of the argument that the crime of rape was the sole cause of the crime of lynching.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman was just saying that the fourteenth amendment guaranteed every citizen the equal protection of the law. Does he think he is carrying out that protection when he allows a man to be lynched by four men and does not take jurisdiction of the case, but he does when five men do the lynching?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is a matter that will be discussed under the five-minute rule. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman has undoubtedly given the constitutional phase of this question a good deal of attention. I should like to ask directly for his opinion in reference to section 2. It provides that when any State or governmental subdivision fails to protect life that that State or subdivision shall be guilty of a violation of the provision of the Constitution which says that equal protection of the law shall be afforded. Does the gentleman think that a State, acting in perfect good faith and doing everything in its power to enforce the laws when it fails to protect life, transfers its jurisdiction over those crimes to the Federal Government?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is the large question in this case. This is not to be quibbled over, and I am not quibbling over it. And, as I stated in the beginning, the length of time allowed for the discussion of this bill is because of the vastly important questions that are involved in it. We have extended the provisions of the Constitution of the United States with reference to interstate commerce into every section of our country. We can with equal propriety, I think, inquire into not only the right but the duty of extending that provision that guarantees the equal protection of the law into every section of the country.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman answer this question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In one moment. The commerce clause of the Constitution is no more sacred nor binding than the constitutional provision guaranteeing the equal protection of the law.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from Delaware.

Mr. LAYTON. The constitutional provision as to prohibition is admitted. Would you admit that under that constitutional amendment you could penalize a county or two counties in a State because of a bootlegger breaking the law?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no. That is not provided for, and it is not analogous to the pending question.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question? I am sincere in this.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I am not sure that I understand the provisions of the bill exactly, but as I understand it, at Cleveland, Ohio, six or eight months ago there was a bank robbed, and the whole citizenship turned out, several hundred, and they killed one of these robbers. If this bill were a law, would it make that county liable to the victim's family for damages to the extent of $10,000?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That is a matter that I am not prepared to discuss.

Mr. BEGG. But it is pertinent.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is pertinent, but I say I am not prepared to discuss it at this time. The debate will bring that out, I hope.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I should like to conclude.

Mr. TILLMAN. The fourteenth amendment says no State "shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Semicolon; "nor deny"——

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes; "nor deny." Now, the State does the denying.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, no.

Mr. TILLMAN. "Nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction equal protection of the laws." Does the gentleman see any distinction between five individuals doing a thing and a State doing or not doing a thing?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. There is a separation of the clauses there. The sense changes and the purpose changes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do you assert that the last clause here does not refer to the State but does refer to individuals?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The last clause refers to negative rather than to affirmative action of the State.

Mr. TILLMAN. It says, "Nor"——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And semicolon.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, is the gentleman familiar——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; I must proceed and close.

Mr. TILLMAN. Has the gentleman read the opinion of Judge Brewer in One hundred and nineteenth Supreme Court Reports, in the case of James against Bowman, coming up from Kentucky?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I do not now recall the decision.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill is of serious importance, sufficient to engage the attention of this House. Its discussion should be helpful in arriving at some method of stopping what lynching has not stopped. It should also be helpful in arriving at some method of stopping lynching. The House should at least have the wisdom and judgment to adopt this rule and discuss the question. It should not be side-stepped. And that is the question now before the House. That is the question that you are now called upon to vote upon. Are you willing to put in five or six days in discussing a question that is vital to the whole country? Are you willing to discuss its constitutionality? Are you willing to discuss the wisdom of enacting it into law if it is constitutional?

These are the questions that address themselves to you at this moment. If so, if you are willing to give this measure the discussion, the deliberation, and the consideration that its importance entitles it to, you will vote for the adoption of the rule that provides for its consideration.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. It is quite clear that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. EDMONDS with Mr. WINGO.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] for the previous question.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee), there were—ayes 157, noes 75.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas and Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee were appointed to act as tellers.

The House again divided and the tellers reported—ayes 127, noes 50.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 169, nays 37, answered "present" 5, not voting 221, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of the Speaker and he answered "Yea."

The SPEAKER. On this vote the yeas 169, the nays 37, and present 5—211 Members present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members, and the Chair will issue his warrant to the Sergeant at Arms to bring in the absent Members. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the vote now to be taken again upon ordering the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It is. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 171, nays 42, answered "present" 4, not voting 215, as follows:

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make an inquiry. Is this a de novo vote?

The SPEAKER. It is an automatic vote on no quorum.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is to say, the number now voting will not be added to the number voting on the former roll call?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; it is a new vote.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I notice I am paired with somebody. I was not supposed to be paired until to-morrow, and I desire to do whatever is necessary to correct the situation. It is not only true on this roll call but apparently on several others, and I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. The pair can be recalled.

Mr. REED of New York. I would like to have the pair recalled until to-morrow and vote "aye."

The name of Mr. REED of New York was called, and he voted "aye."

The SPEAKER. Call my name.

The name of the Speaker was called, and he voted "aye."

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Florida, Mr. CLARK, who is unavoidably absent, and I desire to withdraw my vote of "aye" and answer "present."

The name of Mr. LANGLEY was called, and he answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I renew the demand.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum. I withdraw the point.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-eight gentlemen have risen to demand the yeas and nays, not a sufficient number.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, has the Chair announced the vote on the resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There was a division?

The SPEAKER. No; the division was demanded and the yeas and nays were demanded. The Chair announced the yeas had it, and then a division was demanded and the yeas and nays were demanded. Now, the yeas and nays have been refused.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided: and there were—ayes 143, noes 29.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I challenge the vote because no quorum is present or voted, and I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-seven Members are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 170, nays 42, answered "present" 5, not voting 215, as follows:

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea" on this last roll call, and I also voted "yea" on the previous roll call. I have a pair with the gentleman from Florida, Mr. CLARK. I want to change my vote to "present" on this roll call, and I desire to ask the Speaker whether I can do the same on the previous roll call?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not.

Mr. LANGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that I may change my vote to "present" on the last roll call.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman can not do that by unanimous consent.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am informed that I did get consent and did change it.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman did, the RECORD will show it.

Mr. LANGLEY. Very well.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a very brief statement regarding what I consider an emergency of immigration, the condition having arisen by which certain people are sent back to Armenia from the United States, and where the report is that the minute the hands of the Government are off of them they are murdered.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this another measure to relax the restrictions upon foreign immigration?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is not. This is to give authority to the Secretary of Labor, by means of bonds, to keep his hands on all persons for whom there is no protection. I want to state also that the germ of this measure has the indorsement of the American Legion, the American Federation of Labor, the several railroad brotherhoods, the Young Men's Christian Association and the Young Women's Christian Association, and all the churches, regardless of their creed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted I present herewith the text of a resolution which I have presented on the floor, and which I am now introducing through the basket. This resolution I shall press for passage, believing that the same will in large measure solve a most distressing situation, and one which some of us foresaw many weeks ago. I do not believe that this resolution, if enacted, will enlarge, break down, or weaken the 3 per cent law. We admitted by special resolution about 11,000, who came in excess in June, owing to the shortness of time for the determination of the quotas. We now have in the United States about 1,300 in excess of quotas, and may have 3,000 more, a small number in comparison with the 700,000 or 800,000 the law has kept out in six months. The text of the resolution follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 237) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to stay the deportation of certain aliens in cases of extreme hardship.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Labor, upon a satisfactory showing being made in individual cases of the imposition of extreme hardship or the likelihood of death if deported, is hereby authorized to stay for not to exceed six months at a time the deportation of persons arriving in the United States in excess of quotas authorized by the act of Congress entitled "An act to limit the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved May 19, 1921, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That such persons are proved to be (a) relatives of citizens of the United States or (b) relatives of persons who have been domiciled in the United States for at least two years; and bearing such relationship as (1) fathers, (2) mothers, (3) husbands, (4) wives, (5) minor children, (6) dependent unmarried brothers under 18 years of age, and (7) dependent unmarried sisters; or (c) dependent orphans under the age of 15 years: And provided further, That in all cases there shall be given competent bond for the support of all such temporarily admitted persons and for their return to the custody of the United States.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the address delivered by Hon. Albert D. Lasker, chairman of the United States Shipping Board, before the Association of Commerce, Milwaukee, Wis., on Tuesday, December 13, 1921.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address of Hon. Albert D. Lasker, chairman of the United States Shipping Board, before the Association of Commerce, Milwaukee, Wis., on Tuesday, December 13, 1921.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS OF ALBERT D. LASKER, CHAIRMAN UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD, BEFORE THE ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE, MILWAUKEE, WIS., TUESDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1921.

Because vital legislation concerning our merchant marine must soon come before Congress, discussion of America's future on the seas is a matter of particular moment at this time.

It was my honored privilege to submit the manuscript of this address to President Harding, whose passion to see America successful on the ocean is second to none.

In the prairie towns, cities, villages, and farms of our inland States the future of America on the seas will be decided. The points farthest from the ocean will decide the fate of American shipping on salt water.

The dwellers of our coastal cities by and large are naturally for a permanently established American merchant marine. They may differ as to the means and methods to accomplish this; some, through selfish interests, may wish a limited American merchant marine, because peculiarly they are the beneficiaries of the present system. But, taken as a whole, the dwellers on our coast look forward to the day when ships and shipping in America will once more occupy the great place of importance in our national life which it did during its flourishing days from the establishment of the Republic until approximately the Civil War.

It is the inland dweller, removed from direct contact with ships, who has felt a disinterestedness in American shipping that has almost amounted to an adverse prejudice if American shipping required national aid to insure its life.

The inland dweller has felt that the profits of shipping inured entirely to the wealthy coast cities; that it was a local issue for local profit and one that should be supported locally.

The great World War, with the upheavals that followed, has brought no question that more presses for instant attention with the American people than the question of what is to be the immediate future of our merchant marine. This, not only because as a result of the war the Government became possessed of the largest single fleet the world ever knew—some 1,500 steel ships of over 10,000,000 tons—but because in the war we learned that both from the standpoint of national defense and to insure our overseas commerce we are not safe in relying on foreign bottoms to carry our trade.

VITAL QUESTIONS PROPOUNDED.

A few days before I prepared this address Nation's Business sent me the following questions from the Traffic World, of Chicago, and asked that I discuss same. These questions seem to cover the very essence of the opposition that springs from the superficial or the sinister or the ignorant to the great enterprise of a reestablished American merchant marine. The queries propounded are:

"Is there anything sacred in the doctrine of an American merchant marine, or any lack of patriotism in being opposed to such an institution as an economic extravagance?

"Can an American merchant marine be maintained without what amounts to subsidy and taxation of the public?

"Is John Smith, who knows and cares nothing about the shipping business, willing to be taxed, and ought he to be taxed, in order that Bill Jones's goods may be carried in American rather than foreign bottoms?

"Does Bill Jones care, or ought he to care, whether his goods are carried in American or foreign bottoms?

"If he ought to care, why ought he?

"Should John Smith pay taxes so that Bill's care may be gratified?

"If an American merchant marine can not be maintained without taxation of the public—in other words, if it can only be maintained and operated at a loss—why not let the foreign ships have the business?"

I shall not attempt here to answer these questions in categorical order, but shall endeavor to discuss the American merchant marine and its future with these questions as a basis, because they seem to so thoroughly cover the ground of inland indifference.

THE CORNER STONE OF ECONOMIC SAFETY.

No thinking man can feel that there is anything sacred in the doctrine of an American merchant marine, any more than there is anything sacred in the doctrine of a large Navy, or anything sacred in the doctrine of a large Army, or anything sacred in a Federal reserve bank as against the loose banking system we formerly had, or anything sacred in a direct system of taxation as against an indirect system of taxation, or anything sacred in any one of a thousand and one questions that relate to our national life. It is not a question of what is sacred in doctrines discussed; it is a question of what is sound; and the proponents of an American merchant marine feel that it is a very unsound doctrine that fails to teach that one of the corner stones of economic and national safety is a merchant marine built, owned, manned, and operated by Americans.

There certainly is no lack of patriotism in being opposed to the American merchant marine as an economic extravagance, provided it is an economic extravagance. But if it be not an economic extravagance, then indeed mere ignorance of the question is a poor excuse for being opposed unintelligently to something so vital.

ARMS CONFERENCE AND MERCHANT MARINE.

With this premise it would seem meet to discuss why a merchant marine is one of the corner stones of America's economic life and safety.

The great Limitations Conference which is now proceeding so auspiciously at Washington represents one of the high-water marks in American statesmanship and world vision. It is an achievement that long will stand as one of the glorious jewels in the crown of American accomplishments.

Granting that the 5-5-3 naval program, or some equivalent, be adopted and that we have a naval holiday for a term of years, the question of naval equality is not solved: because, if in addition to the equalized navies, any one nation possesses a merchant marine of convertible strength vastly beyond that of another nation, the nation possessing that added convertible merchant tonnage has the preponderance of naval power.

PRESENT FLEET RESULT OF WAR NECESSITY.

The Government's vast fleet, built as a war necessity, will ever remain a tribute to America's miraculous ingenuity and energy. During the war it was a question of building a bridge of ships across the ocean, regardless of type, regardless of balance, regardless of cost, but with the sole purpose in mind of the maximum tonnage in the minimum time, facilities considered. There is no man in the allied countries but will admit that in large measure the building of the United States Government's merchant fleet hastened the end of the war, through the potential strength it showed the Imperial German Government that America possessed to quickly put unlimited armies of men and supplies on the battle field.

But there is no man who is conversant with the subject but who will admit that for peace purposes the Government-owned fleet is not well balanced and is not in its entirety economically available.

BRITISH AND AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE STRENGTH.

Without boring you with figures, taking into consideration passenger ships and combined passenger and cargo ships of 8,000 tons and over, which represent the very cream of the merchant marine convertible for naval purposes, Great Britain possesses 234 ships of this type already completed, and the United States possesses 54 ships, a ratio of 4.3 to 1 in favor of Great Britain. Taking into consideration vessels now actually building in both countries of this type, the ratio in favor of Great Britain will be increased 5 to 1.

When speed is considered, and speed is essential for naval purposes, the ratio is even more startlingly in favor of Great Britain, as of vessels of 22 knots and over she possesses 5, the United States possesses only 1, a ratio of 5 to 1; in all vessels of 12 knots and over, which is the minimum speed useful for naval operations, she possesses 234 and the United States possesses only 53, a ratio of 4.4 to 1 in favor of Great Britain.

There is no man who presumes that in our lifetime there will be war between ourselves and our British friends. It is for this happy reason that, without thought of war, the relative superiority of the British merchant marine overseas for convertible purposes may be used to illustrate the increased importance of a merchant marine to the national defense under the gloriously changed naval conditions into which we are entering.

We should remember that if we enter a 10-year naval holiday, which means practically little naval work for our shipyards, and if we fail to establish a merchant marine, with its constant need of renewals and repairs, American shipyards will be largely closed and the art of shipbuilding will practically be lost to us. Should again the day come when, in the national defense, we must make use of our Navy, we would be lacking the yards and the trained workers to renew its strength; and the nations which during the holiday period had kept their yards alive with merchant-marine work would have an unmatchable advantage over us.

When President Roosevelt sent our fleet around the world it had to be bunkered and provisioned by the British merchant marine. The navy giant which we sent for the admiration of the peoples of the earth displayed that its feet were made of clay. This must never be again.

But the proponents of an American merchant marine must rest their case far beyond the grounds of national defense, which to the layman at best is academic and far off, though to those who, with statesmanship vision, realize all the potential possibilities of the future it is a matter of deepest concern.

The claims for an American merchant marine must rest on its economic necessity to the American people as a whole. The claims for an American merchant marine can rest on the proof that John Smith, who knows and cares nothing about the shipping business, but who ought to know and care a lot about it, should be willing, if necessary, to be taxed, and ought, if necessary, be taxed, in order that Bill Jones's goods may be carried in American rather than foreign bottoms. In our Republic our common good fortune is reliant on the agencies essential to that good fortune. That, gentlemen, is the very crux of the whole question. Let us proceed to explore it.

CHANGING CONDITIONS IN AMERICAN TRADE.

So long as America had its own great empire to conquer—an empire of fabulous natural wealth, an empire of almost seemingly inexhaustible and balanced raw materials—America could trade within its own confines, independent of the commerce of the world. It was during this period of our history, when the lure of unconquered golden opportunities called forth the adventuresome spirit of our young manhood, that America's merchant marine, fostered to proud proportions by our original thirteen seacoast States, began to decline and finally came to small proportions.

Even before the World War vast changes in the domains of current life made us a largely increased importing nation. For instance, the automobile has completely changed our national life. It has, by common acceptance, passed the luxury stage and become an essential necessity in large measure, compared to its output. The automobile, to be potent, require tires, and tires mean rubber. There is no rubber produced in the United States.

Because of the very prosperity of America from within, through the development of its natural wealth, the American people as a whole demand luxuries as do no other people of the world, until these very luxuries become necessities in America's life. Some of these luxuries, such as coffee and sugar, are largely imported. And so, in the cycle of events, our very self-sufficiency from within gave rise to luxuries which finally became necessities, until we perforce changed from a nation almost entirely an exporter of raw material to one, in large measure, an importer of raw material.

A POINT OF VIEW.

Even before the World War our manufacturing capacity was increasing by leaps and bounds. I well remember about 10 years ago on a train between Milwaukee and Chicago two foreigners, who evidently were traveling on a business tour in America and who had been visiting in Milwaukee, were seated behind me. One of them made a remark to the other that indelibly impressed itself on my memory. He said:

"The very genius and danger of America is that it is never satisfied. In America if a man has a plant capacity that at any time does not equal his demand he is jealous of the thought that a competitor should have the trade, and he immediately starts building without regard to the fact that, similarly possessed with a desire for volume, his collective competitors build, so that the American potential output is constantly based on the peak of demand without regard to the average, which, when it does prevail, makes unprofitable many of the expanded plants."

The very germ of philosophy of our economic strength and weakness was embodied in this statement. The Great War merely inflamed that spirit in America and gave opportunity to it for fullest play beyond the imagination of man. With the war ended and the world sobering up from its madness, manufacturing America finds itself with a surplus of plant account which must find permanent markets in the world as well as at home if overhead expenses are to be met and profitable operation insured. With the enlarged American plant capacity in many lines, unless world markets are conquered, profitable operation is endangered, and unemployment for periods longer than would exist otherwise will come into being.

The farmer's direct and overwhelming interest in the overseas trade was proved not a great while ago in his pressure on Congress which resulted in the passage of a bill over President Wilson's veto directing the resumption of the War Finance Corporation with authority to issue a billion dollars in credit for the purpose of aiding him in exporting agricultural and other products. Surely, with such a proved interest in export for his surplus in order that prices might be maintained, the farmer must become conscious that it is essential that America control the vehicles of export delivery that his needs may be surely met in times when other nations might not be able or would not be willing to furnish us the necessary bottoms.

EFFECT OF RAW-MATERIAL IMPORTS.

America at one time was practically self-contained. The world demanded our raw materials in great volume, and we largely consumed at home what we manufactured. But now that we are such great importers of raw materials (which come largely from nonmanufacturing countries) we must perforce send manufactured goods to these countries to balance our trade, and with the added plant capacities that we have we must find still further foreign markets for our manufactured goods to bring our overhead down.

Beyond all this our greatest present customers owe us vast sums of money, which they can only pay if we take merchandise from them, and if we permit them to sell us merchandise we in turn must find new world markets for the surplus products which we shall thus have.

FOREIGN TRADE MUST BE DEVELOPED.

Therefore it is true—and no blindness nor unwillingness to recognize the fact can change the fact—that stability in America and restored normal prosperity must be based on development of foreign trade and foreign markets in a measure never before realized by Americans. A new era in world trade has come to America, whether America wills it or not.

Here is where the absolute necessity of an established American merchant marine enters as one of the very cornerstones of our prosperity, for two reasons: First, because we can not rely on others for the tonnage needed, when and where, to carry our goods to markets we would conquer, and, second, because we can not afford, in the interest of national prosperity, to pay the freights to foreigners which should remain at home. No ambitious American industry would be content to rely on its competitor for the delivery of its product.

When Great Britain was engaged in the Boer War she could not, as many will remember, divert her merchant tonnage to American usage. Had we at that time had world commerce to protect, as we have now and will have in increasing measure, we would have been in a sorry plight, and should Great Britain, still mistress of the seas in merchant marine, ever get into war with another power, America being no party to the controversy, our chief carrying agent would once again have to divert her merchant marine from our purposes and needs.

IDLE FLEETS AND FUTURE TRADE.

The history of shipping is one of shortages and surpluses. To-day there is a surplus of shipping in the world, so that one-half of America's fleet is tied to the docks and all nations have ships of their flags idly swinging at anchor. But it is a poor imagination that can not realize that world conditions repeat themselves, and sometime again in the years to come, within the life of practically every man in this audience, there will be a shortage of shipping. In such period of shortage ships will first be available to the manufacturer whose country has the largest tonnage, for he can afford to bid as much as any manufacturer, and the preference will be his.

REGULAR SCHEDULES PARAMOUNT.

The very life of foreign commerce is that the exporting nation should have regular, constant, and uninterrupted communication to the importing nation. America, with its vastly increased need for export business, must insure that export business by insuring that it owns and controls the ships to carry its trade. Moreover, shipping lines are the best agents of our foreign trade. America can not afford to take the risks that, for any reason, relying on ships of another flag, these ships may be withdrawn from its needs. For if the foreign purchaser finds that he can not get his goods when he wants them and as he wants them he will find other sources of supply, and once lost to us his custom will be hard to win back.

OF VITAL IMPORTANCE TO ALL.

The dweller on the farm, the worker in the mine, the laborer in the factory, whether he lives in Wisconsin or Kansas or New Mexico, has as much interest in an established American merchant marine as has the man who lives and toils on the docks of our great ocean port cities, because, unless America meets changed conditions from within, which I have attempted to sketch, and changed world conditions which have been brought about by the war, its export business will fail, factories will close, and there will not be profitable demand for raw materials or finished products. When export business fails and factories close, the industrial worker can not buy the product of the farm.

Through the agency of vast railroad and train transportation, with telegraph, telephone, and postal services, we are all one in modern civilization. When the fabric breaks for one, it breaks for all. A coal strike, and we all suffer. Supposing the ports of New York, Boston, Norfolk, New Orleans, Galveston, San Francisco, Portland, and Seattle for some reason—let us say, an unbreakable strike—were closed for six months. Everyone must visualize that factories would practically close down, because one could get in neither needed raw materials nor get out of the country manufactured materials that would enable one to keep factories going. Surely every inland dweller on farm or in the city would suffer.

Having visualized this, then picture what would happen to us if for any reason in world competition, because of circumstances beyond or within our power, the ocean-carrying of America's trade was in the hands of its competitors when the time of market competition was with us. Is it not to be supposed that these competing nations would find, even at a seeming loss of profit to themselves, good reason why we did not get the ships when and as we needed them?

In the course of a decade America pays out some billions in freights. These freights include only incidentally profit; the main thing, though, which freights cover is cost of operation. This cost of operation includes, again in turn, the cost of the ship, the cost of subsistence, the cost of fuel and supplies, and the wages. If John Smith, as an individual, pays out $50 in Europe for something, John Smith is not $50 poorer as against if he had bought that same thing at home. But if 110,000,000 John Smiths pay out in freights billions to foreign nations the Nation is those billions poorer as against if it had retained the money at home, because the national wealth that is traded in around the circle domestically remains the property of the Nation as a whole, but once it is traded abroad it passes from the national wealth, particularly in such matters as freights.

OTHER NATIONS WELL ESTABLISHED.

The other maritime nations of the world, having centuries of established foreign trade relations behind them, have benefits that we in America must pay a price and suffer time to bring to us. They have all the good will and profit that come from the volume of established trade. They have that experience which comes from constant operation. But, beyond all, the other maritime nations of the world have the benefit of lower cost in production of ships and lower cost in operation of ships, in many instances because of their lower standards of living. No man should ask an American on the sea to live at lower standards than the American on land.

ADVOCATES NATIONAL AID TO SHIPPING.

For these several reasons we can have no American merchant marine save that we pay a price of time and money to get the volume and to learn the business.

If it is proved that every American, be he inland or coastal dweller, is directly interested, in the insurance of his daily wage, in an American merchant marine, then, if it is necessary to pay a price to insure the establishment of an American merchant marine, it becomes the duty and inures to the profit of the Nation to pay that price, for it can not be paid by any group of individuals engaged in the particular enterprise if that enterprise must for any length of time be carried on, because of national reasons, at a national loss, when in the ultimate the establishment of the enterprise is one of the very corner stones of insured national weal.

That strategic trade routes shall be insured to America, the Shipping Board, under mandate of the Jones Act, through which it exists, operates its fleet at great cost to the Government and, under certain conditions, to the great injury of private capital, which can not compete with the Government. In due course national aid to private shipping should result in the Government's retirement from operation, so that ultimately no increased drain on the Treasury would be involved, and through profitable private operation permanency would be insured to our merchant marine, private initiative and enterprise would be inspired, and the Government would find customers for its large fleet of ships.

INCREASED SALE PRICE FOR OUR FLEET.

Only through national aid to private shipping can I see a market created for the Government's fleet—and Government aid should come back to the Treasury many times over in increased sales prices we will get for our nationally owned ships. In some form or other all the successful maritime nations have won their power on the sea through Government aid to private operation. What is here and now proposed for America is merely in line with accepted practice, at some stage of shipping in each country the world throughout.

No mere miracle of American genius can establish a merchant marine, for efficiency on the seas naturally belongs and is held by those nations who have the most practice on the seas. Given the same experience, Americans will have it in fullest measure—in man for man, given opportunity for experience, in greater measure than others.

RAILROADS AIDED; WHY NOT SHIPS?

No mere miracle of American ingenuity can win in short time the volume of business and assured trade routes necessary for profitable operation. This requires years of continued and uninterrupted operation. The great empire of the United States never could have been conquered unless aid had been given American railroads in such measure as man never dreamed of aid being given enterprise. The States and the Nation showered upon the railroads inestimable natural wealth to make their building possible and their operation possible while trade was being built up.

As important as the railroads were in the wresting of the empire, so now, in the cycle of events, transportation on the sea becomes a paramount issue of the day, unless American statesmanship is bankrupt and American vision blind. Shall we, standing in our own light, surrender to others the wealth of opportunity which is ours, stupidly and blindly holding to fetishes of past conditions? Or, recognizing changes from within and without, shall we do that which is necessary to give to our children the same opportunity that our fathers had and that came to us?

ONE FOR ALL AND ALL FOR ONE.

Our John Smiths, our blind John Smiths, our ignorant John Smiths, our narrow John Smiths, our insular John Smiths, who know nothing and care nothing about the shipping business, should at least tax their brains to learn and see the obvious—that Bill Jones's goods are their goods, that Bill Jones's prosperity is their prosperity, that Bill Jones's adversity is their adversity, and that unless Bill Jones has an assured foreign trade, which can only be insured through American bottoms, Bill Jones will fail to prosper, and in his failure John Smith fails.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD concerning the same subject as that referred to by the chairman of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization [Mr. JOHNSON of Washington].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the same subject as that referred to by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter written by Gen. Pershing explaining that the so-called Lost Battalion was never lost.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ANTILYNCHING.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate under the resolution which has just been adopted on the antilynching bill may continue not to exceed 14 hours in all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that debate on the antilynching bill be continued not to exceed 14 hours in all. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HAYS, on account of public business (at the request of Mr. DYER).

To Mr. ALMON, for four days, on account of official business.

To Mr. ACKERMAN, for one day, on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, December 20, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

428. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions, together with a copy of the report of the board of actuaries; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

429. A letter from the chairman of the Federal Power Commission, transmitting copy of the first annual report of the Federal Power Commission; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

430. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Navy, transmitting draft of a bill making appropriation for payment of claims of W. B. Moses & Sons, Willis-Smith-Crall Co., American Home Furnishers' Corporation, Western Electric Co., and S. A. Curtis; to the Committee on Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KAHN: A bill (H. R. 9632) to authorize the acquisition of lands for military purposes in certain cases and authorizing appropriations therefor, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SINNOTT: A bill (H. R. 9633) to extend the provisions of section 2305, Revised Statutes, and of the act of September 29, 1919, to those discharged from the military or naval service of the United States and subsequently awarded compensation or treated for wounds received or disability incurred in line of duty; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. HUSTED: A bill (H. R. 9634) for the creation of an American memorial highway commission for France and Belgium to designate roads over which Americans marched to victory and to secure the erection of historical rosters of American divisions engaged and other appropriate memorials thereon; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. PARRISH: A bill (H. R. 9635) to provide for flying pay for officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army who are incapacitated by reason of injuries incurred in or by aircraft accidents; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota: A bill (H. R. 9636) to provide for flying pay for officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army who are incapacitated by reason of injuries incurred in or by aircraft accidents; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 237) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to stay the deportation of certain aliens in cases of extreme hardship; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BIRD: A bill (H. R. 9637) granting a pension to Willard D. Brittell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9638) granting a pension to Elvira F. Jarrett; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BURROUGHS: A bill (H. R. 9639) granting an increase of pension to Walter E. Ellis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DREWRY: A bill (H. R. 9640) to authorize a survey of that portion of the Appomattox River, in Virginia, from Petersburg to the James River; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. ELLIOTT: A bill (H. R. 9641) granting a pension to John A. Gallagher; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FAVROT: A bill (H. R. 9642) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the city of Hammond, State of Louisiana, one German cannon or fieldpiece; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HAWLEY: A bill (H. R. 9643) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Wiggin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HUTCHINSON: A bill (H. R. 9644) for the relief of Burton Tettemer; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KEARNS: A bill (H. R. 9645) granting an increase of pension to Charles W. Shrope; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9646) granting a pension to Elizabeth Davis; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KOPP: A bill (H. R. 9647) granting a pension to Alma W. Yewell; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PARKER of New York: A bill (H. R. 9648) granting an increase of pension to John D. Donovan; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REECE: A bill (H. R. 9649) granting a pension to Miles S. Sisk; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9650) providing for the retirement of Jacob C. Jones; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 9651) granting an increase of pension to Lou Bettis; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9652) granting a pension to Elijah Wilson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9653) granting a pension to Creed F. Casteel; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9654) granting a pension to Green W. Blakely; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. THOMPSON: A bill (H. R. 9655) granting a pension to Stephen Shirley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

3352. By the SPEAKER (by request): Letter from the Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, general secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, presenting a copy of actions taken by the executive committee at their annual meeting in Chicago, December 14 to 16, 1921; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

3353. By Mr. ANSORGE: Letter from Marshall Field & Co., of Chicago, opposing the proposed American valuation plan in the tariff bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3354. By Mr. DRIVER: Petition of the Phillips County Game Protective Association, in support of Senate bill 1452; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

3355. By Mr. FULLER: Petition of the Knitted Outerwear Manufacturers' Association, favoring passage of tariff bill at earliest possible date, for adequate protection, and American valuation; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3356. Also, petition of the J. C. Penney Co., of La Salle, Ill., opposing the American valuation plan of the Fordney tariff bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3357. By Mr. KISSEL: Petitions of J. M. Richardson, Munn, Anderson & Munn, William Bohleber, and Erwin, Fried & Czaki, all of New York City; to the Committee on Patents.

3358. Also, petition of John Simmons Co., of New York City; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 20, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, Thou art the author and giver of every good and perfect gift, and at this season of the year we especially think of Thine unspeakable gift in the person and ministry of Thy Son, our Savior. In His name we humbly beseech Thy blessing upon our daily tasks. Help us so to walk in the ways of Thine own appointment that we shall fulfill our duty in Thy fear and to Thy glory. In Christ's name we ask it. Amen.

FRANK B. BRANDEGEE, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, appeared in his seat to-day.

NAMING A PRESIDING OFFICER.

The Secretary, George A. Sanderson, read the following communication:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., December 20, 1921.

To the SENATE:

Being temporarily absent from the Senate, I appoint Hon. SELDEN P. SPENCER, a Senator from the State of Missouri, to perform the duties of the Chair this legislative day.

ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
President pro tempore.

Mr. SPENCER thereupon took the chair as Presiding Officer.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2780) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2591) to provide for the construction of a public bridge across the Niagara River, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed bills of the following titles, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 1577. An act to provide a preliminary survey of Cowlitz River, Wash., with a view to the control of its floods;

H. R. 1578. An act to provide a preliminary survey of the Puyallup River, Wash., with a view to the control of its floods; and

H. R. 8344. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time under oil and gas permits, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ROBINSON presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Arkadelphia Milling Co., of Little Rock, Ark., praying that corn flour, grits, and cream meal, rather than corn, be exported to relieve distress in Russia, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition from R. E. Lee Wilson, of Wilson, Ark., praying that adequate appropriation be made for the continuance of experiment work in animal husbandry in Arkansas, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Cleveland (Ohio) convention of the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, commending the President of the United States for calling the Conference on Limitation of Armament, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PAGE presented resolutions adopted by the annual meeting of the Orange County (Vt.) District of the New England Milk Producers' Association, favoring the enactment of the so-called Voigt bill prohibiting interstate commerce in the product known as "filled milk," the enactment of the so-called Capper-Volstead bill giving farmers the right to pool their products for marketing purposes, etc., and inclusion in the permanent tariff bill of rates requested by the New England Dairy Tariff Committee, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. LADD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Corinth, Cooperstown, Hope, Larimore, Willow City, Rolette, Benedict, Bisbee, Hatton, Foxholm, Van Hook, Hettinger, Thompson, Lansford, Nortonville, Adrian, Ruso, and Buxton, all in the State of North Dakota, praying for the passage of Senate resolution 133, directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the conditions affecting the demand for foreign disposition, movement, and use of American exported grain, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CALDER presented six petitions of 6,224 citizens of the State of New York, praying for the recognition of the Irish republic by the Government of the United States, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McLEAN presented resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the Waterbury Chamber of Commerce, of Waterbury, and the Derby Business Men's Association, of Derby, both in the State of Connecticut, favoring the retention of the American valuation plan in the pending tariff bill, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by members of Mary Clapp Wooster Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of New Haven, and of Roger Sherman Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of New Milford, both in the State of Connecticut, favoring the passage of Senate bill 1967, declaring the battle field of Yorktown a national military park upon the acquisition of the site at a cost not exceeding $100,000, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Stafford Springs, Conn., praying for the passage of the so-called Lehlbach-Sterling civil-service reclassification bill, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

He also presented a resolution adopted by a meeting at Waterbury, Conn., November 27, 1921, of about 2,000 citizens of Lithuanian birth or descent, protesting against alleged inhuman and barbaric acts of Poles in Vilna, and the support afforded Poland by the French Republic, and requesting that restitution be made for damages to Lithuania caused by the Poles; that the guilty Polish leaders be punished; that the French withdraw from Memel and vicinity, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KENYON, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 146) authorizing the President to extend invitations to foreign Governments to send delegates to a world's dairy congress in 1923, reported it without amendment.

Mr. LADD, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 133) directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the conditions affecting the demand for foreign disposition, movement, and use of American exported grain, reported it without amendment.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 6557) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to repair and rebuild customs buildings in Porto Rico, and to pay for same out of duties collected in Porto Rico, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 368) thereon.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (S. 2023) defining the crop failure in the production of wheat, rye, or oats by those who borrowed money from the Government of the United States for the purchase of wheat, rye, or oats for seed, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 369) thereon.

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to, and the bills were indefinitely postponed:

H. R. 2558. An act for the relief of Richard P. McCullough (Rept. No. 370); and

H. R. 7870. An act for the relief of I. C. Johnson, jr. (Rept. No. 371).

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. TRAMMELL:

A bill (S. 2889) to provide additional funds for loans to farmers through the Federal land banks; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

A bill (S. 2890) authorizing the War Finance Corporation to make advances and to purchase securities to provide relief for producers of and dealers in agricultural products until July 1, 1923, under the provisions of sections 21, 22, 23, and 24 of the War Finance Corporation act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended by an act approved August 24, 1921.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I suggest that the bill be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I think that committee handled the measure when it was up before.

Mr. SMOOT. The legislation creating the War Finance Corporation was considered by the Finance Committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am not particular about the reference.

Mr. SMOOT. Reference to the Finance Committee would be in regular order.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I was under the impression that the amended act providing for the extension of the activities of the War Finance Corporation was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I may be mistaken about it, however.

Mr. SMOOT. The provision for its creation was incorporated in the revenue bill of 1917 or 1918, I forget which.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The reference made by the Chair will be satisfactory to me.

By Mr. KENYON:

A bill (S. 2891) to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912, as amended; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 2892) granting an increase of pension to Adaline M. Underwood; to the Committee on Pensions.

UNITED STATES JUDGES.

Mr. CURTIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 9103) for the appointment of additional district judges for certain courts of the United States, to provide for annual conferences of certain judges of United States courts, to authorize the designation, assignment, and appointment of judges outside their districts, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF HEARINGS ON TARIFF BILL.

Mr. SMOOT. I send to the desk a concurrent resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the concurrent resolution.

The reading clerk read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 17), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,500 copies of the hearings before the Committee on Finance of the Senate on the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, revised and indexed, of which 2,000 copies shall be printed as separates, by schedules (including not to exceed three supplemental volumes), 1,000 copies for the use of the Committee on Finance of the Senate and 1,000 copies for the use of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be held for compilation by volume, of which 500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate document room and 1,000 copies for the use of the House document room: Provided, That the compiled edition only shall be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the object of the concurrent resolution is to save a great deal of expense and time. The hearings before the Finance Committee on the tariff bill have proceeded up to this point to such an extent that they will result in four volumes. There is an order now that a certain number of copies of the hearings shall be printed. While we are printing those we might as well print also the number that will be required for the folding rooms of the two Houses. The object is to save the expense of doing the work again after the bill is completed, and also in order that Members of the Senate may have, if they wish them, the separate volumes upon any one schedule of the tariff. For instance, schedule 1 will be the American valuation; schedule 2 will be the embargo on dyestuffs; schedule 3 will be the chemicals, perhaps with one other schedule included. It certainly means a saving of a great deal of money.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

CONDITION OF DOCKET IN SUPREME COURT.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I send to the desk a resolution, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the resolution.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 198), as follows:

Whereas all causes brought to the Supreme Court of the United States for final decision should be acted upon by said court without undue delay; and

Whereas if the docket of the said court is so congested that litigants are unable to obtain a prompt decision in the court of last resort the Congress should afford the relief necessary to correct such conditions; and

Whereas the Senate desires information upon the question of whether or not there is such number of cases constantly pending in said court as to make it impossible for the court to dispose of cases without long delay and hardship upon litigants because of their inability to get prompt action in this the highest court in the land: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States is requested to direct the clerk of said court to furnish to the Senate such data and information as may be necessary to indicate the condition of the docket of the said court; to advise the number of cases on the docket awaiting final disposition by the court; to give the average length of time required for a decision after cases are ready for action by the court; and to furnish such further information as the Chief Justice may order the clerk to transmit to the Senate in response to this request regarding the status of the litigation in the said court.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I understand that the resolution goes over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over under the rule.

INVESTIGATION OF CIVIL-SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

Mr. ROBINSON. I submit a resolution, which I ask may be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The resolution (S. Res. 199) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators, who shall be members of the Committee on Civil Service, be appointed by the President of the Senate, and the said committee is hereby authorized and instructed to investigate the proceedings of the Examining Division of the Civil Service Commission, and particularly to ascertain whether political influence has been used in said examinations and in the making and alteration of grades relating to the same, and whether the act of Congress giving preference to ex-service men in appointment to office under civil-service regulation has been observed and executed.

Said committee is empowered to sit during the recess and sessions of the Senate, at such times and places as by it may be deemed advisable, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths and to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, and such clerical assistance as may be necessary. All expenses of the committee incurred under this resolution shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers authorized by the committee and signed by the chairman thereof.

Said committee shall report its proceedings and findings to the Senate within 90 days.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON subsequently said: I introduced to-day a resolution providing for an investigation of the Examining Division of the Civil Service Commission and asked that the resolution might lie over under the rule. I had expected to submit to the Senate a statement on to-morrow in justification of the resolution. After consultation, however, with some of my colleagues I have concluded that the consideration and passage of the resolution would be facilitated by a prompt and immediate reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which reference is necessary under the rules of the Senate. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the resolution be referred to that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so referred.

ACTUARIES' REPORT ON CIVIL-SERVICE RETIREMENT LAW (S. DOC. NO. 107).

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, on yesterday there was transmitted to the Senate by the Acting Secretary of the Interior the report of the Board of Actuaries relative to the operation of the act for the retirement of employees in the classified service, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service. The report is important and should be printed. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it may be printed to the extent of 2,000 copies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by title and referred, as indicated below:

H. R. 1577. An act to provide a preliminary survey of Cowlitz River, Wash., with a view to the control of its floods; and

H. R. 1578. An act to provide a preliminary survey of the Puyallup River, Wash., with a view to the control of its floods; to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 8344. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant extensions of time under oil and gas permits, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

NIAGARA RIVER BRIDGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2591) to provide for the construction of a public bridge across the Niagara River, which was, on page 2, line 9, after the word "applicable," to insert: "Provided further, That before the construction of the said bridge or tunnel shall be begun, all proper and requisite authority therefor shall be obtained from the Government of the Dominion of Canada."

Mr. CALDER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on December 20, 1921, the President approved and signed the bill (S. 2108) prohibiting the interment of the body of any person in the cemetery of White's Tabernacle No. 39 of the Ancient United Order of Sons and Daughters, Brethren and Sisters of Moses, in the District of Columbia.

REPORT OF JUVENILE COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA (S. DOC. NO. 106).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the report of the Juvenile Court of the District of Columbia for the period from July 1, 1917, to June 30, 1921.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, December 20, 1921.

NOTE.—Report accompanied similar message to the House of Representatives.

THE "FARM BLOC" IN CONGRESS.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD one or two short statements. In view of the attack of the Secretary of War at a dinner or banquet somewhere a few weeks ago on men who are trying to do something in Congress for agriculture I wish to place in the RECORD a reply from Capper's Weekly, a paper edited by the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER]; and also an article appearing in the Philadelphia North American of this date with reference to the speech of Secretary Wallace last night in Boston, showing that the entire Cabinet at least is not indorsing the attack of the Secretary of War.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I say that I have not read the speech of the Secretary of War, but from some newspaper accounts it seemed to me there was no attack upon agriculture or the proponents of agriculture, but that it was rather an appeal for the maintenance of parties and the contention that our Government was founded upon parties or at least that the administration of the law and all the best interests of our Government and the people would be subserved by the maintenance of party government in the United States.

Not being a Republican, of course I have no right to participate in the controversies of our Republican friends, but I think that much could be said in behalf of the Secretary of War.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Capper's Weekly.]

(By ARTHUR CAPPER.)

NOW WEEKS GOES FOR THE "BLOC."

Secretary Weeks, a new assailant of the farm bloc, is and long has been a Wall Street broker. He deplores the good old days of "Cannonism," and naturally the days of the agricultural bloc can not appeal to him. To the West, if not to Wall Street, from CANNON to the agricultural program championed at Washington by western representatives spells progress. Then the farm bloc supported a successful effort to reduce the size of the Regular Army.

[From the Philadelphia North American of Dec. 20, 1921.]

WALLACE DEFENDS ORGANIZED STAND FOR FARM BLOC—SPEECH IN BOSTON REVEALS CONFLICT IN HARDING'S CABINET—URGES FEDERAL AID.

BOSTON, December 19.

A sharp conflict within President Harding's Cabinet over the agricultural bloc in Congress was revealed here to-day in a speech by Secretary of Agriculture Wallace before the Boston Chamber of Commerce.

Speaking in the stronghold of Secretary of War Weeks, who opened the administration campaign to wipe out the farm bloc in a recent address in New York, Secretary Wallace vigorously upheld the bloc members for their organized stand on recent legislation.

Reciting instances of the farm bloc's influence in the Senate and House, Mr. Wallace declared "that anyone should be disposed to regard such legislation as class legislation intended to or having the effect of benefiting one group at the expense of other groups, is surprising."

"Should those who have been charged with promoting class legislation for the benefit of agriculture desire to retort," Mr. Wallace said, "they could find many examples of unquestionable class legislation enacted on behalf of relatively smaller groups."

"Forty per cent of the whole country is somewhat more than a 'group.'"

"It is time," Mr. Wallace said, "for the eastern industrial section to realize that it is the farmers who feed the entire Nation and supply the largest market for manufactured products."

Declaring that the United States is passing through the most severe agricultural depression in its history, Mr. Wallace said, "The first duty of the Nation is to bring agriculture through this period with the least possible damage."

Mr. Wallace advocated Federal supervision of stockyards, market agencies, and grain exchanges; more credit for the farmer; improvement of marketing methods and transportation of farm products at "lowest possible cost" consistent with the cost of maintaining the railroads.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN RUSSIA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 369, the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is hereby authorized, through such agency or agencies as he may designate, to purchase in the United States and transport and distribute corn, seed grain, and preserved milk for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia and for spring planting in areas where seed grains have been exhausted. The President is hereby authorized to expend or cause to be expended, out of the funds of the United States Grain Corporation, a sum not exceeding $20,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act: Provided, That the President shall, not later than December 31, 1922, submit to the Congress an itemized and detailed report of the expenditures and activities made and conducted through the agencies selected by him, under the authority of this act: Provided further, That the commodities above enumerated so purchased shall be transported to their destination in vessels of the United States, either those privately owned or owned by the United States Shipping Board.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fernald	Ladd	Ransdell
Ball	Fletcher	Lodge	Robinson
Bursum	France	McCumber	Sheppard
Calder	Glass	McKellar	Smith
Cameron	Gooding	McKinley	Smoot
Capper	Hale	McLean	Spencer
Caraway	Harris	McNary	Stanfield
Colt	Heflin	Moses	Sterling
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Swanson
Curtis	Kendrick	New	Townsend
Dial	Kenyon	Norbeck	Trammell
Dillingham	Keyes	Page	Wadsworth
du Pont	King	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] are detained from the Chamber on official business of the Senate.

I also desire to announce that the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] is absent on the business of the Senate, and that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is absent on account of illness in his family.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I submit a proposed unanimous-consent agreement in relation to the unfinished business which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut presents a request for unanimous consent, which will be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] asks unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Tuesday, January 17, 1922, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after the hour of 1 o'clock p. m., on said calendar day, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I should like to reserve the right to move to recommit the bill, and I assume that if I so desire I may have that privilege. If necessary, I desire to add such a proviso to the proposed agreement.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following proviso to the request for unanimous consent:

Provided, That nothing in this agreement shall prevent the entertainment by the Chair of a motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, my understanding on yesterday was that the Senator from Connecticut was willing to have a vote tak n upon this measure to-day, provided we did not insist on going on with it yesterday. I know that I consented, so far as I was concerned, as others did on this side of the Chamber, to go into executive session under the impression we were going to have a vote on the measure to-day. I was anxious to obtain a vote on it yesterday. There seems to be some misunderstanding about this matter. Now, the Senator from Connecticut wants to postpone action on it for three weeks or more.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Alabama will allow me, after a careful review of the situation during the time intervening between yesterday and this morning, I think it would be but justice to all interested parties, perhaps, if the proposed unanimous-consent agreement were entered into. The bill is familiar to all Senators, and I do not think anything would be gained at all by attempting to force its passage now. It will stand or fall by its own merits, and delay will not jeopardize it one way or another. I hope that the Senator from Alabama, who has so earnestly cooperated in advocating the passage of the bill, will unite with us and let us have the consideration of this question set for a time when we may discuss it in all of its phases. After conference with the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I have agreed to the request for unanimous consent, and I think that we should all accede to it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, Mr. President, I shall not object. I was very anxious to have a vote on the bill before the holidays, but I realize that the Senator from Connecticut and others who oppose the proposed substitute for the measure could keep us from having a vote upon it; and in order that we may have a date certain fixed for the determination of the question I shall not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN RUSSIA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I take it for granted that every Senator is aware of the conditions now existing in starving Russia. They may not know the details, nor the extent of the catastrophe which has befallen that people, but I am sure there is not a man in public life who does not realize the horrible conditions which confront the unfortunate population in certain parts of Russia. So acute has the situation become and so broad is its scope that the President of the United States took occasion in his last message to call the attention of the Congress to it and to plead with Congress to provide an appropriation to save the lives of hundreds of thousands of Russian children, and also of men and women in certain sections of Russia, from horrible death by starvation. I agree with every word that the President said in his message touching this matter.

At once action was taken by the House of Representatives; a bill was prepared appropriating $20,000,000 out of the funds of the United States Grain Corporation, not only for the purpose of feeding the starving people of Russia to the extent of $10,000,000, as recommended by the President in his message to Congress, but there was added a $10,000,000 appropriation for the purpose of buying seed grain in order to provide the distressed people in Russia with at least sufficient seed grain to enable them to produce the next harvest, in the hope that, perchance, the elements will be more propitious in the coming year than they have been during the last three years, for during that time there has been a drought in Russia the like of which has never before been known in all the history of that country.

Mr. President, I have heard stories told of conditions existing in Russia by men coming from that unhappy land that would melt a heart of stone and would appeal to the charity of any living soul. The President, in appealing to the people of the United States and to the Congress for this relief, was answered quickly; and, as I have stated, the bill carries an amount even larger than the original request, in order that those people may have at least a chance to produce in the land of Russia enough foodstuffs to keep body and soul together for the coming year.

Mr. President, $10,000,000 is required to feed them, to take care of the dying children, who are to-day living upon grass and roots, and nothing else; and, remember, this relief is not to be distributed by any Russian agency. Every pound of grain that will be shipped under this bill will be distributed by American agencies, and every pound of it will go to some suffering, starving individual of that unhappy country.

I noticed that there was some little opposition to the measure in the House; but I believe that when Senators follow the discussion in the House they must conclude that there is only one thing to do under the circumstances, and that is to do what is right, and to do what you would ask the people of the world to do for you if you were in the same condition.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator if he has considered the constitutional question as to whether or not Congress has the power and authority to make an appropriation of this kind for this purpose out of the money of the taxpayers of the country? The principal objection that was raised in the other body, I think, was based on constitutional grounds; at least one of the main objections urged there was on that ground. I did not know whether the Senator had considered it or not.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator will find that that was pretty well answered in the discussions on the floor of the House. I have not any doubt at all but that Congress has a right to make this appropriation by way of gift to the Russian people. The Congress of the United States has given to China $20,000,000 to relieve the Chinese people of an obligation owing the United States. That action meant just so many dollars to the taxpayers in the United States. No question ever arose then, and I can not believe that there is anything in the question of the constitutionality of a bill of this sort.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DIAL. Under what provision of the Constitution have we the right to pass such a bill?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I offer a suggestion?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. When the bill was here carrying an appropriation of $100,000,000, as Senators will remember, for relief across the sea, some of us made arguments to the effect that the bill was not constitutional; that it was a pure gift. Speaking only for myself, I do not believe that we have any right to vote away public funds as a mere gift, if that is all there is to it. I desire, however, to call the attention of the Senator from Florida and the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to this fact in that connection:

This is not merely a gift. It is sound economic policy. We are helping the situation in our own country; and that takes it out of the category of a mere gratuity and brings it under the Constitution under the general-welfare clause. I think there can be no doubt about it.

Mr. DIAL and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

Mr. SMOOT. I will go further than the Senator goes.

Mr. KENYON. I am speaking merely from a constitutional standpoint.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that, as far as I am concerned, if a majority of the House of Representatives and a majority of the Senate of the United States will vote for and the President of the United States will sign a measure to relieve a suffering people, to keep millions from death, I as a citizen am willing it shall be done, even though its constitutionality is questioned.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I can not follow the Senator as far as that.

Mr. SMOOT. I will go that far, just the same as if I saw a dying man starving to death, and if I had control of funds as a trustee, I would see that he did not starve to death, and I would take my chances of getting the money back in some other way, or take my chances of being condemned for the act. I think life itself enters into this proposition to such a degree that I believe the American people from one end of the land to the other will say that Congress did the proper and right thing.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think the illustration is apt at all; but, in the first place, in those circumstances I would find some way of giving relief without being obliged to violate a trust. It seems to me that no matter what the merit of the cause may be, no matter how far our sympathies may extend, we have no right to do anything here which violates our oaths to sustain and uphold the Constitution of the United States. That is of prime and supreme importance.

I am not saying that this measure is unconstitutional. I am only suggesting that if the Senator had thought about that phase of the matter he might give us some light upon it. I think that when the matter was under consideration in the other body it was disposed of somewhat on the theory which the Senator announces—that, Constitution or no Constitution, here is a case where we ought to save human life, and we are going to do it.

With reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa, of course, in war times and under war conditions the powers of Congress are quite different from what they are under ordinary circumstances and in peace times. The appropriation to which the Senator refers was made under war conditions and in war times. I have not any question but that it was justified and warranted and legal and valid and constitutional in every way at that time. The precedent to which the Senator refers with regard to China is more in point; but, of course, it may be a dangerous thing, and may lead us very far afield, if we keep piling on one precedent after another. We have granted aid in the case of earthquake sufferers and tidal-wave distresses and that sort of thing; but, as I say, we had better be careful not to make one precedent lay the foundation for another course of action which rather extends and enlarges and gets us further and further away from the fundamental law of the land.

Some of this fund also, as I understand, will not go to buy grain and supplies and milk from this country, but some of it will go in other directions. In other words, not all of it is to be expended in the United States and thereby be justified upon the ground suggested by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? The constitutional question is important, and I agree with him that we should have constitutional authority for everything we do.

Suppose the farm prices, we will say, of crops had gone to such a point in this country that there was a great surplus and the farmers were actually bankrupt, does not the Senator think that under the Constitution Congress could pass an act to buy those crops?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think so. I think that could be done.

Mr. KENYON. Then we could do anything we pleased with those crops after we had bought them, could we not?

Mr. FLETCHER. That perhaps would apply under the general-welfare clause, which is confined to operations in this country.

Mr. KENYON. We could take those crops and give them to anybody on the face of the earth. Now we have a situation in this country to-day where some of the things that are to be purchased here are almost in that condition; so that while philanthropy is the thing, of course—I do not want to consider it from any other standpoint—yet, to get under the Constitution, we can well take the ground that it will be of economic value in this country through buying these things and in that way helping to dispose of the crops and adding to the general prosperity. That is what fixes my mind on the constitutional question.

I did not vote for the other bill because it seemed to me that there was absolutely no constitutional power to take the money of the people and give it away; but this is different.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it seems to me, looking at it from a selfish standpoint as a nation, that the granting of this $20,000,000 for the purposes named in the bill will bring results tenfold, aye, perhaps a hundredfold, in the near future. Russia is not going to be governed for many years longer in the way and by the powers that are directing her affairs to-day. Russia is going to be one of the great powers of the world. Russia has within her borders more undeveloped territory and more undeveloped natural resources than any other country in all the world. The day will come when the farmers of America will want the trade with Russia, the manufacturers of America will want to resume trade with Russia, and indirectly it will benefit every citizen of the United States and benefit the Treasury of the United States, too.

Why, Mr. President, at one time we appropriated $800,000 for the relief of the earthquake sufferers at Martinique, and at another time we appropriated $200,000 for the relief of the earthquake sufferers in Italy.

I am quite sure, Mr. President, that all will admit that it is far better to die by earthquake, and have the sufferings over at once, than to have death come slowly by starvation or from underfeeding. That is what is going on in Russia to-day. No one abhors the conditions existing in Russia to-day more than I, but it seems to me that if I had a bitter enemy, even though he were my bitterest enemy, I could not see him or his children dying by inches, day by day, and knowing that it would be only a short time before not only he, my enemy, but all of his children as well, would starve to death. Rather would I take him and his children and feed them than to see such a condition as that exist.

Mr. President, I think the $10,000,000 for seed grain is quite as important as the $10,000,000 appropriated to feed those people.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if the committee has amended the bill as it passed the House?

Mr. SMOOT. No; not in any respect. The bill is reported just as it passed the House. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] made reference to the fact that part of this money would be expended outside of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator again, I desire to ask him if the committee has taken into consideration the fact that this would fortify the soviet government of Russia?

Mr. SMOOT. That has been taken into consideration; but it can not possibly assist that government at all. My opinion is that it will be the means of weakening the soviet government in Russia. Those starving people, whose lives may be saved by American charity, will wonder why their own government did not aid them, and they will offer up thanks that there was such a Government as the United States, whose people were so liberal as to come to their relief in a time of dire trouble and distress. I think it will be the entering wedge to drive from power the men who are to-day directing the affairs of Russia.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, has the Senator considered the fact that our farmers throughout the country are in a most distressed condition? They are to-day in a worse condition than any I can recall in my long life.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator think that if this $20,000,000 were given to the farmers of this country, it would be a great blessing to them, and that we had better confine our efforts to the people at home who need the help rather than to go abroad?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the greater part of the $20,000,000 will go to the farmers of this country. That is one of the advantages of this bill. It will mean that the products which are an absolute drug upon the market to-day will be taken from the farmer, and I look to see the price of corn, which has been so low of late that it has not paid the farmer for raising it, advance.

I hope and believe it will stabilize the market price of that commodity, and not only benefit the farmer to the extent of the $20,000,000 that will be given to him for his product, which lies to-day unused in this country, but it will tend to raise the price of that which he may sell hereafter in his own local market.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity as yet to examine the hearings, but can the Senator tell us whether anything was brought out at the hearings to the effect that the Russian agricultural population is at all familiar with the use of corn?

Mr. KENYON. I can answer that question, Mr. President. It is shown in the hearings that each little commune has its own grinding establishment, and they grind it in the commune.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then they are familiar with the use of corn meal?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; and not only that, but it will cost nothing to do so. I know there is an endeavor being made by some of the millers of this country to have this corn ground in the United States and shipped as corn meal instead of whole corn. While I would like to see that work done in the United States, it would be very unwise to do so. I think it would be a grave mistake.

Mr. FLETCHER. Would it be safe to ship the meal, or the corn, for that matter? Is there not danger that even corn itself may heat and spoil?

Mr. SMOOT. No; there is no danger in shipping the corn, but there is danger of the meal heating, and I think the proper thing to do is to get the greatest quantity that will feed, and the children there and the other people in those little communities, after they get the corn, will prepare it. I want every child and every man and every woman who has a kernel of it to get all the sustenance possible out of it, but if we grind the corn into meal here there will be fewer kernels of corn and less substance in them for the Russian people than if we send it over there as the whole corn, and give them all that there is in it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, if the Senator will turn to page 12 of the hearings, he will find the answer to the question asked by the Senator from New York, which he might desire to put in his remarks.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Iowa can read it if he desires.

Mr. KENYON. The very question asked by the Senator from New York was asked of Gov. Goodrich. The question was:

Mr. BURTON. What do you say as to the adaptability of Indian corn for food for them? Could they readily use it?

Mr. GOODRICH. Yes, sir. They are well equipped to use corn for food. Every commune in Russia has its communal windmill, with the old-fashion stone burrs, at which they grind all their food. In this manner, instead of extracting the oil as we do in this country, it will be kept in the meal and furnish them the fat which they so much need.

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator for reading that. I suppose that every Senator has read the short report made by Mr. TEMPLE from the House committee, and I shall not take the time to read it to the Senate now. I trust there will be no opposition to the bill. If we are going to pass it at all, let us pass it to-day. Let us get the corn on the way. The stories that are told of the suffering among the people in certain sections of Russia make me, at least, feel as if I would not want a minute's time to elapse, if it were possible, before we say to those starving people of Russia, "Have courage. Relief is on the way. It will come to you just as quickly as American ships can carry it." We can all imagine what would take place in many little communities when the message arrives. Therefore I ask that we pass this bill to-day, if it is to be passed at all. Let us get the corn and the other relief on the way to those suffering people.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I sympathize with the Russian people, and particularly with the Russian children, and I realize that it is absolutely unavailing to oppose this bill. I do not want to put myself in the attitude of being hard-hearted, according to the standard set up by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and of not aiding the suffering people of the world in every way consistent with my duty. It seems to me, however, that this is a very dangerous precedent we are following. I do not think the relief extended to China, referred to by the Senator, is analogous to this.

It is true that we donated to the earthquake sufferers in Italy some time ago a large sum of money. If we were more prosperous in this country, possibly no notice would have been taken of this, but when we realize the condition of our own people, I feel that we should be very careful about giving away the money of the taxpayers of this country.

I have not the least doubt but what this bill is unconstitutional. I do not think it has a semblance of law to back it up. In fact, Mr. President, we have stretched the Constitution so far that the framers of it would not recognize it if they should see it now.

I desire to help suffering people everywhere. I desire to give employment to everybody out of employment; but I must say, though it may sound a little harsh, that I never was much in favor of making donations. I think we have carried the idea of making gifts too far. It does but little good to give a man anything. He will spend it perhaps in riotous living and come back and want you to give him more. The greatest good anyone in this world can do to mankind is to help people to help themselves, aid them to get on their feet, let them find that they can use their strength and their ability and their brains to make a living for themselves.

It is a wrong principle to expect the United States to act as the Santa Claus of the world. I venture to say that the people of many sections of the world are not any worse off than the people are in some sections of this country where we have had a total crop failure. Now, when our own people can not pay their taxes, when there are tax executions by the hundreds of thousands all over the country in the hands of the sheriffs, for us to donate this large sum of money is, I insist, beyond our power and in bad taste.

Mr. President, what I think ought to be done is that we should put this fund or some other fund in the hands of some organization that could help the Russian people to plant and get on their feet and make a living. That would perhaps be justifiable, but even then it would be going a very long ways. Make it a loan. I do not know that it is our business to look into the domestic affairs of the people of the world. I do not know that the Russian people are in a much worse fix than the people of Armenia and perhaps other sections of the earth. If we allow this to go by it will not be long until there will be some other appeal here, and there is no telling where the thing will end. "Hard cases make bad law."

Some time ago I talked to a Russian about buying cotton in the South. He told me that they had plenty to pay for goods that they could buy in the United States. He brought up the question of his Government, but I told him I did not care to discuss that. He said that the Russian people do not ask the United States Government to recognize the Russian Government; that all they want us to do is to establish trade relations with them; that they are prepared to pay for what they need; and that they want to a very great extent the trade of the United States.

I do not care to discuss the Russian Government, but it seems to me if it is wrong, and I believe it is wrong, that the people there ought to rise up and overthrow their Government. It does seem to me that there would be enough societies in Russia, enough cities in Russia, enough of some kind of organizations, who could get together and see that the people do not perish. Then if they want to borrow in the United States, it might be a good policy for us to lend to them with a view of getting that money back some time perhaps. If not, it could be done with a view of letting them have some seed and then let them get some farm implements, and tell them to go to work, and that after a certain time they need not expect more help from us.

I do not believe it will be many years until the people of many parts of the world are going to come to Congress and be forever knocking at our doors asking alms. We are drifting rapidly in the direction where England has gone, to the giving of unemployment compensation to people who do not work. A short time ago I was talking to one of the largest merchants in the world. He told me that he had a plant in England and that one of the workmen quit and he asked the foreman why the man had quit. The foreman investigated and reported back that the laborer said he preferred to quit and get the unemployment compensation rather than work and get the wages he was getting in the factory.

We ought to realize that we are not here to donate the people's money. We are here to run the Government according to law and according to the Constitution, and I hope we will get back to that principle. I deeply sympathize with everyone who is suffering. I do not know whether the statements which we get are exaggerated or not, but there ought to be some way to have this aid administered in a businesslike way. Let every individual contribute according to his means to every worthy cause. We all do that.

Perhaps it is useless to offer it, but I move to amend the bill in line 11, page 1, by striking out "$20,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$10,000,000."

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I do not wish to quibble with people whose views do not coincide with mine. Since I have been a Member of Congress I have stood for many measures that gave me serious concern, some of them with reference to constitutional questions, and some of them as to policy. I can not find it in my heart to quibble about matters of this kind when children are dying for lack of bread. I would not, if the child were mine, let the Constitution or anything else stand between me and giving it something that would sustain life. If I feel that way with reference to my own child, I do not think I am a good man if I am perfectly willing to see my own fed and my neighbor's child die of want.

I shall vote for this measure with pleasure, and I shall vote for the amount of $20,000,000, and I am willing to vote for more. If those little children and their mothers come back here with empty hands at some other time, I can say now that so long as I am here they will have one vote to relieve their wants, and let the constitutional question be left to those who want to quibble about it.

If any man who lives in my State sees fit to complain of the small contribution that he may be required to make to pay this $20,000,000, I think I would be perfectly willing to pay it for him. I do not believe, however, there is a man, woman, or child in my State who would not go into their pockets for this relief, and I know they are willing to have it come from the Treasury of the United States in that good cause.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I see so many reasons for supporting the bill that I can hardly discern how anyone can find any for voting against it. The Government of the United States has pretty thoroughly established the precedent that in the face of a great world calamity involving a vast number of people it will join others in going to their relief. Congress has done that on many occasions, and I think it is too late now to raise the technical question of the constitutional power of Congress to vote a trifling amount of money for so great a cause.

I am very sure that anyone who has had a first-hand description of the awful tragedy now being enacted in the Volga Basin, involving the starvation of whole communities, involving some 15,000,000 or 18,000,000 people over an area of country as great as several of our States, would, like the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY], be unwilling to delay even for a day the sending of relief and the doing of our part to bring relief.

This does not involve the voting of $20,000,000 or any other sum to Russia. It involves the sending of about 10,000,000 bushels of corn that is otherwise likely to be burned for fuel in this country. That is what it involves. It involves the doing of a thing which costs us little or nothing, the doing of our share toward meeting a great world calamity.

I think, moreover, that we are not entirely doing a disinterested act when we do this thing. There is a great possible future value not only to the United States but to civilization at this time in impressing the Russian people with the fact that they have brothers in other lands. There is a great sentimental value in making that impression upon those millions of people who have been taught that the rest of the world is their enemy. There can not be any doubt in the world of the value of establishing such a sentiment in the Russian heart. Already the work of relief is in progress in Russia, and I am told that it has already made a profound impression not only among the masses of the Russian people but upon the governors of Russia.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is not that I am antagonizing the Senator's belief, but in connection with the possible credit that this country would get among the people of Russia for this donation, it has been suggested and I think the hearings will disclose, at any rate the debate in the House will disclose, that the bolsheviks in Russia, the Reds, if you please, are telling the people there, and there is a very considerable propaganda on that subject spread throughout this country by their representatives here, that it is because of the bolshevik work in the United States that this donation is being forced through Congress and that the whole credit is due to the bolshevik representatives in Russia and in this country for the donation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I believe I know enough of the facts to say that there is not any such real impression in Russia and that the Senator is misinformed in the matter. There may be men in this country who spread such an idea. The Russian Government rather reluctantly consented to have the American agents go in there. They rather reluctantly gave them the right to go in, because they were afraid that they would use their influence with the Russian masses against the Russian Government. But they have been disillusioned. They have thrown everything open to the American agents who are already at work there, and those agents are reasonably secure in their statements when they say that they will probably be able to save the lives of 1,200,000 children with what they already have.

The result of their work has been already felt with the Government, which has placed all the facilities in the hands of the American agents. The Russian Government has turned those facilities over to them, and, as the testimony before the House committee shows, has imposed the most severe penalties on anyone interfering with them in any way or plundering any of their goods. They all look upon the United States in a different light from what they formerly did.

Mr. President, I have spoken of the possible sentimental value, not only to the United States but to civilization generally, in letting the Russian people know that the world is not their enemy. The Russian people have been deluded, no doubt, but here is going to be an act of the United States, probably followed by the acts of other nations of the world, which will make a profound impression not only on the 15,000,000 or 18,000,000 in the Volga Basin but on all Russia as a disinterested act of Christian charity and generosity. It is bound to make a deep impression on the Russian people.

People are impressionable. When Russia, during the Civil War, sent her fleet into New York Harbor as a sort of warning to Great Britain at the time, as a sort of indication that Russia might be the friend of the United States, it made a deep impression upon the people of the United States, which has never been forgotten here and which has influenced even our policies in the past. Senators can imagine what will be the effect in Russia of this act on the part of the United States in saving not only thousands but millions of people from starvation.

I have had the opportunity to meet several men who have been in Russia and who have been in the Volga Basin, and one can not listen to their description of the actual events there without feeling that the tragedy is of such an enormous and horrible character that it is our duty to come to their relief.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of the pending measure. It is seldom that we have legislation which confers, as one might say, a double blessing. It is a blessing to the poor, destitute farmers in the Volga district in Russia to get this help. It is a great blessing to the farmers of this country who are in a depressed condition. This appropriation opens the door for a market for American farm products that our farmers would not have without it.

The innate justice of it, too, arises out of the fact that this appropriation is to be taken from money which was made in the operations of the Grain Corporation. It is not to be taken directly out of the Treasury of the United States, but is to be taken out of money which was accumulated by that corporation. We all know that there were times during the World War when the farmers could have received a great deal more than $2.25 a bushel for their wheat; that if it had not been for the regulatory and restraining legislation enacted by Congress they would have made a great deal more money; but they were held down to a price of $2.25 a bushel for their wheat. The result was that the Grain Corporation accumulated what may be called an excess profit. It is, therefore, nothing more than just and right that the money which was made from the sale of the farmers' wheat should be now devoted to the purchase of the grain crops of the farmer.

If there is any class of farmers in the country who are to-day suffering more than another class, it is the corn-raising farmers. As the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has well said, much of the corn which it is proposed under the appropriation contained in this bill to send to Russia would otherwise go to waste or would be burned as fuel. How much better it will be to send it over to Europe in order to help the starving people of Russia.

More than that, Mr. President, as I have reflected upon the situation, I have appreciated the moral and ethical value of this proposed action on our part. The people in Russia have by bolshevistic propaganda been taught to believe that our country and other countries are what the bolsheviki call capitalistic countries; that we have no friendship for the poor and downtrodden, but that we are merely a money-making country. By sending this relief to the unfortunate people of Russia we shall demonstrate to them that we are not open to the charge which the bolsheviki have made against us, but that we are a generous, kind-hearted, warm-hearted people, and are as ready to give relief to the poor people of Russia as we are to the poor people of any other country.

As the Senator from Nebraska has also well said, Mr. President, there have been many precedents for granting such relief. I can remember not so many years ago when there was a famine in Russia—and famines occur frequently in that country because a great many sections are within the arid or the semi-arid belt, as are some portions of our own country—the millers of Minneapolis raised amongst themselves a whole shipload of flour and sent it to the starving people of Russia. I recall how delighted and how glad the people of Russia were to receive that gift. I felt and the millers and the people in Minnesota felt that it was one of the best investments which we had ever made. So, Mr. President, in this case we shall not only confer a great blessing on the starving people of Russia but we shall confer a great blessing on our farmers, who are to-day, for the want of a market for their grain, in some respects in almost as distressing a condition as are the people of Russia. This measure will help them to a limited extent, but I wish the proposed appropriation for the purchase of American grain products were $50,000,000 instead of being only $20,000,000.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. NELSON. I yield.

Mr. DIAL. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota, does he understand that the purchase of grain proposed by the pending bill is limited to corn? Is it not to buy wheat?

Mr. NELSON. It covers corn and seed wheat.

Mr. DIAL. Then, flour could not be purchased with the appropriation?

Mr. NELSON. No; but seed wheat could be purchased, and the Russians need seed wheat.

Mr. DIAL. The bill reads "seed grain"; it does not say "seed wheat." Therefore I did not know whether or not it included corn.

Mr. NELSON. It includes corn, wheat, oats, and rye. We have such seed grain here to furnish to the Russians. There is, however, no agricultural product in this country of which there is so great a surplus as there is of corn. It is, therefore, highly appropriate that provision be made for the purchase of corn. The people in Russia will be glad to make use of corn, and they will make good use of it. We need not be apprehensive as to that.

So, Mr. President, without taking up more time of the Senate, I wish merely to say in conclusion that I am heartily in favor of the pending measure, and under the circumstances, if the money shall be devoted to the purchase of the grain products of the American farmer, I should be very glad if the appropriation were $50,000,000 instead of being $20,000,000 as is now proposed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, there is no doubt whatever that we stand in the shadow of a great tragedy. Millions of people in Russia are suffering, and many of them are threatened with destruction. Of course, our hearts are deeply touched by this situation, and I think it is but fair to say that our people are of a kind that rejoices in responding to a call for help. It is difficult, Mr. President, under circumstances of this character to discuss a proposal such as this without giving way entirely to the sentimental side, the side which I say appeals to us very deeply; but observations have been made upon the floor this morning which have called to my mind certain thoughts.

I may be charged before I finish with giving undue importance to certain hard, cold facts. I am speaking not so much in opposition to this bill, but I am speaking rather in a frame of mind which may be characterized as one of doubt, and my intention is to endeavor to bring before Senators certain considerations which we should not forget.

In the first place, certain emphasis has been placed on the fact that the proposed appropriation is to be taken from the funds of the United States Grain Corporation, and an attempt has been made to make it appear that because the money is taken from the funds of that corporation it is the more easily appropriated. Whether the money is taken from the Grain Corporation funds or from the Treasury of the United States it is just the same—money belonging to the people of the United States. If the money of the Grain Corporation is needed for any purpose by the people of the United States and a portion of it shall have been taken away by this act, that sum will have to be made up somewhere else. It will not do, Mr. President, to becloud or confuse the public mind in any way as to what we are doing here. We are, indeed, appropriating the money of the people of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Was not the money in the hands of the Grain Corporation money derived as a profit from the wheat of the farmers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was, as I understand.

Mr. NELSON. The farmers were compelled under the law to sell their wheat for $2.25 a bushel, and the Grain Corporation was enabled to make a profit on the wheat of the farmers sold by them at that figure. The Grain Corporation earned a profit out of the people that no other agency of the Government was able to earn. Now, it is proposed to devote the money which came indirectly from the farmers to help the farmers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not prepared to discuss the operations of the Grain Corporation, and I am not certain that my reply to the first part of the question of the Senator from Minnesota, as to whether or not this fund was collected in the form of profits, was accurate. I am not at present informed about that; my recollection of the operations of that corporation is untrustworthy; but, nevertheless, that money belongs to the people of the United States; that is my only contention in this connection; that this is, indeed, an appropriation of money belonging to the people of the United States, and just as surely an appropriation and just as direct an appropriation as if it were taken from the Treasury of the United States in the usual way. I think we ought to face things just as they are and not disseminate any confused idea as to what we are doing.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. FRANCE. I hope the Senator from New York will face the fact that this money was made out of the funds of the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is another question, but I do not care how it was made; that is not the point that I am driving at; it is the property of the people of the United States that it is proposed to appropriate.

Mr. BORAH. I think Senators are likely to accentuate the proposition of the agricultural bloc here, which I hope they will not do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, observations have been made concerning the benefit which the expenditure of this money for the purchase of grain will bring to the farmers of this country. I hope that idea is not going to be disseminated in all seriousness far and wide over this country, for, in my humble judgment, it is doomed eventually to cause grave disappointment. As I read the hearings, something like 20,000,000 bushels of grain are to be purchased. It is true we have a tremendous surplus of corn, some of which in certain portions of the country is being burned as fuel, and much of which can not fetch, as I understand, much more than 10 cents a bushel, a price far below the cost of producing it. But what is the corn crop of the United States? What does it amount to? I think there have been occasions where it has exceeded 2,000,000,000 bushels. I am not familiar with the figures of the last crop of corn, but I think I am fairly safe in saying that it reached at least 2,000,000,000 bushels. Can anyone persuade me or any other person that 20,000,000 bushels out of a crop of 2,000,000,000 bushels is going to have any marked effect upon the price of corn to the farmer in the United States? I am a little weary of some of the attempts that are so frequently made to fool the farmer. The result which is predicted is not going to happen. I venture to say that the purchase of corn under this bill will not raise the price 2 cents a bushel. It would not count very much if it raised it 5 cents a bushel; it would not count very much if it raised it 10 cents a bushel. The benefit to the farmer is so infinitesimal that he will not know the transaction has taken place; and yet some of the arguments made in support of this proposal is that it is going to confer an economic benefit upon the people of the United States. I have spoken only of the farmer's side of it. I do not want him to be misled.

Now let us look at another fallacy in connection with this thing, as to the economic benefit to the people of the United States as a whole.

Mr. President, some people have advanced the theory in days gone by that one way to increase employment and prosperity is to smash window glass in order that there shall be a demand for new windowpanes and more people put to work and more money spent. Of course that is a fallacy, and everybody knows it. You can not make prosperity by destroying anything; and I think, by the same token, you can not make economic prosperity by purchasing something in this country and giving it away elsewhere—I mean, the economic prosperity of the whole people; economic prosperity that shall have some definite tenure, some element of permanency. Let us not spread the idea and the news that the expenditure of $20,000,000 in the grain markets of the United States, and the giving away in Russia of the grain that is purchased by it, is going to do anything to enchance the economic prosperity of this country, because it is not. It is not an economic transaction, and it should not be heralded as such. It is purely a charitable undertaking. It is giving away property.

I am not opposed to the giving away of property in time of great stress. I am not opposed to charitable undertakings. They make a strong appeal to all of us; but let us not fool ourselves or anybody else with the idea that the expenditure of this money is going to do something to restore business prosperity in the United States, because it is not. The supporters of this bill ought to find, and I am sure do find, much stronger grounds for their support than these statements which have been made here this morning.

There is one aspect of this situation which rather disturbs me. As is well known, a great and very worthily organized association has existed in the United States for about a year, known as the American Relief in Russia. That association, very ably led, I believe very ably managed, economically managed, has been making an appeal to the American people for many months, asking them to subscribe to this great and worthy work. Comparatively speaking—I say "comparatively speaking," and I mean by that when one measures the undertakings and achievements of a charity organization such as this—a considerable sum has been raised. I notice that Mr. Hoover discusses it on page 39 of the hearings. He says:

> I feel that public charity will do everything that charity can do.

He means, apparently, by "public charity," the kind of charitable efforts that I have just described.

> But these are times when one can not rightly summon much public charity for use abroad from the American people.

That is a rather disturbing suggestion, that our people either can no longer afford to subscribe substantial sums to a great charitable undertaking such as this in Russia, or else that they do not want to. I believe that they want to. I believe firmly that the disposition of every decent man and woman in the United States is to subscribe to funds of this kind, to a great charitable undertaking of this kind. I am led inevitably to the belief that they can not afford it.

Mr. Hoover says:

> There are a great many committees working throughout the country under great difficulty, but with a great deal of energy. I do not believe, however, that the total collections since August of the entire group amount to $750,000.

Then he says:

Public charity is not an avenue through which this problem can be solved.

The alternative is Government charity, which is the proposal contained in this bill, and so many people seem to forget that there is no essential difference between Government charity and private charity in the matter of raising the money. If private charity is unable to raise the money on account of the hard times through which the American people are passing, it is not an alternative unaccompanied by handicaps and distressing circumstances to tax those people and distribute the same charity through the hands of the Government. Whichever way you look at it, the people must pay.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator loses sight of the fact that for a number of years now Americans have contributed large sums of money for various foreign charities.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true; with wonderful generosity.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But these contributions have come from a comparatively few people, taking the people in the mass, and the same ones have given and given and given. This is an attempt to spread it over a larger number of people.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Whether they will or not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The fact is that the same people have given year after year to the Armenian relief and to the various reliefs, and the same ones will have to give again. This will call for some very small contributions from a number of people who have given nothing at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am discussing what might be termed the academic side of this question, the substitution of Government charity for private charity. We have apparently reached that point. I think I am not far wrong in saying that the wells of private charity in this country have nearly gone dry; and I do not think I am wrong in characterizing this proposed act as a substitution for private charity of Government charity supported by taxation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is entirely wrong there. This money was not raised by taxation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if we spend this money belonging to the people of the United States it must be supplanted by other money raised by taxation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I just want to correct the Senator. He was quibbling on words a while ago. I want to correct him when he says that this money was raised by taxation. It was raised through the energies of the very man who now seeks to use a part of it to bring relief.

Mr. BORAH. Whose money is it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why, it is the money of the people of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That was not what the Senator said. He alleged that this money was raised by taxation. That is what he said.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; the Senator from New York did not allege that this money was raised by taxation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; that is exactly what the Senator said.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just a moment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. He said that we were being asked to spend this money raised by taxation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I made the observation that I was discussing this subject from the academic standpoint; that apparently the wells of private charity, for the time being at least, have gone dry, and that measures of this sort represented, to my mind, a substitution for private charity of Government charity based upon taxation in the last analysis, and that is what it is. I see no escape from that conclusion.

Mr. President, I do not begrudge especially the appropriation of $20,000,000 for the suffering people of Russia, but I want Senators to cast their vision forward, and indeed bring up some of their recollections of the past, and let it be thoroughly understood what shall be the policy of the United States Government, what shall be its policy with respect to the expenditure of the money of the people, taken from those who work for a living in the sweat of their brows, in the form of taxes collected. Occasions will arise in the future, undoubtedly, where great areas of the earth will be subject to fearful suffering. It is but a few months ago that there was a tremendously extensive famine in China. The Chinese, too, are worthy of our charity. There have been other corners of the earth terribly distressed, and there will be in the future. The one aspect of this situation which rather disturbs me is the fact that, as I said a moment ago, we are going to supplant with Government charity that spontaneous private charity the display of which is one of the glories of the human race, and that from now on, apparently, we are going to adopt the policy that the Government will manage the outside charities of the people of the United States and will assess the citizens the amounts which the Government thinks the citizens should contribute.

I suggest that for the consideration of Senators. I think it is a step backward. I think it holds some danger in the future to a sound fiscal policy for this Government and for any government that embarks widely upon such a policy.

There is no doubt in my mind that this bill will pass. I did not want it to pass without making these observations. They may be, and probably are, worth next to nothing; but, such as they are, I have submitted them. Whether they are worth next to nothing at this time or not the occasion is bound to arise in the future when we shall once again be called upon to spend the people's money for like purposes. Are we to go on indefinitely?

Something has been said this morning about the beneficial political effect of this donation. Something has been said to the effect that the sending of this relief to Russia will do much toward putting the American people right with the Russian people, and the contention is made that from that standpoint there is some advantage to the people of the United States through the giving of this grain. Quite possible that is true. I can very well understand how millions of people in Russia will feel a great sense of gratitude to the people of the United States. Undoubtedly they feel it already for what private charity has done. But if we are going to have an intelligently selfish purpose in expending the money of the people of the United States I have a suggestion to offer, which may seem radical, which perhaps has not been offered before, but which I think combines intelligent charity with intelligent self-interest. I have discussed this matter with people who are familiar with the present-day conditions of the Russian people, and have received some encouragement concerning it.

Of course, there are many sad things in the conditions in Russia to-day, but if there is one thing that is sad it is the utter breakdown of education; that is, of the kind of education which we Americans believe is sound and wise and civilizing. The terrible political upheaval has in a large measure wiped out all that comparatively small percentage of the Russian people who had enjoyed educational advantages. A very large percentage of that people is illiterate. If we want to help the Russian people, and do something which will help them permanently, make them grateful to us, and increase our prestige and our legitimate influence with them, we might well consider seriously extending educational facilities to Russia.

I believe that money spent in that way would come back to the United States multiplied four or five times in its benefit and value, and that such action would do much toward stabilizing political conditions which in large part have contributed to the bringing about of the famine conditions of the Volga Basin.

Mr. President, I would welcome the reduction of this $20,000,000 proposed to be appropriated for the purpose of distributing grain, and the use of a portion of that money for the purpose of educating young Russian men and women who can not get an education, and to have it done by making the colleges and technical schools and universities of the United States available for them.

That may seem somewhat like an extreme suggestion. I offer it for the purpose of suggesting to Senators that if there is to be intelligent self-interest on our part when we make these appropriations, perhaps one of the most valuable things we can do toward increasing our own prestige and our legitimate influence is to help in the reeducation of a people who have been through such a stormy period during the last five or six years that nearly all opportunity for higher education, at least, has gone glimmering.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator is very interesting, but I invite his attention to the fact that if any attempts were made along the lines suggested by the Senator they would have to relate to the émigré population. I would not favor that, because most of those are intelligent. If we attempted to extend education to young men and women within Russia, under the political régime which is there dominant, interdictions would be interposed to their coming to this country. I venture to suggest to the Senator that it would be far better, and would do more for the development of the country, if we could send to Russia a number of technical men, men versed in agriculture, in electricity, and in those matters which relate to the development of the country. It seems to me that if we could send commissions of that character of technical men and help them rehabilitate the railroads, inaugurate proper systems of irrigation, and proper methods of agriculture, we might make some very valuable contributions to the welfare and the prosperity, material and moral, of the Russian people; but I fancy the Senator would have great difficulty in bringing young men and women out of Russia for educational purposes at the present time while the powerful bolshevik régime is in power.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am inclined to believe the Senator is correct. I am not suggesting the ways and means or the details of helping the people in this way. My thought was aroused to this point by the observations which have been made upon the floor of the Senate to the effect that we should exercise or show an intelligent self-interest in this matter. It is a phase of it which has been thrust into the discussion, and having been thrust in I offer the suggestion that perhaps the most effective way of serving ourselves, while at the same time serving the Russian people, is to assist them toward a better and higher degree of education, according to the American conception of education, and create in the Russian mind a friendly feeling for America for not only a year or two or ten years but for generations to come; help the Russians to understand American institutions and business organizations, and America's resources and her commerce, and in more ways than one help economically and commercially the people of the United States, while at the same time conferring a great boon upon the people of Russia.

Mr. President, I do not want to give the appearance of harshness or lack of feeling. We are going to appropriate this $20,000,000. We are going to appropriate it from the Federal Treasury, and it is a gift. We are proud of our ability to make the gift. We fondly hope that it will bring a great blessing to the Russian people. But while we are doing it, we must understand exactly what it means, and not attempt to deceive anybody by the suggestion that it is going to increase the economic prosperity of the people of the United States, or extend considerably the political influence of the people of the United States, or raise the price of corn in our domestic markets, or avoid imposing some burden of taxation upon the people of this country. We ought to learn to look things straight in the face, and it has been my humble effort this morning, Mr. President, to contribute to that end.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the best friends this Republic has had in Europe in the last hundred years has been the Russian people. They are the only great people in Europe who have not at some time or other disclosed a great enmity toward the people of the United States and toward our Government.

At one time during the late Great War Russia mobilized 21,000,000 men upon the side of the Allies. In February, 1917, she had 14,000,000 men in her army, fighting over a front of 3,500 miles. During the time that she was fighting upon the side of the Allies, she lost two and a half million men killed upon the field of battle. She lost in injured or wounded three and a half million more. She had 2,000,000 men taken prisoners, 1,000,000 of whom died in prison. At one time she had a third of the German Army, two-thirds of the Austrian Army, all of the Hungarian Army, and a large portion of the Turkish Army arrayed against her. She captured during the war 400,000 German prisoners, 300,000 Hungarians, 300,000 Austrians, and a million Turks.

The fighting which the Russians did in this war has no parallel in the war when you take into consideration the adverse circumstances under which they fought. The adverse circumstances and the suffering of the Russian soldiers were only paralleled by the adversity and the suffering of the American soldier during the great American Revolution.

They fought under such circumstances that those in the advancing lines were compelled to wait until their comrades fell to grasp the weapons with which to continue the fight. They literally fought at times with their naked fists. They were practically barefooted as they waded through the snow. This is but an intimation of the great suffering and sacrifice made by the Russian soldiery upon the side of the Allies during the war, a thing which we have wholly forgotten. I say wholly forgotten; wholly forgotten so far as Government or official action is concerned. Since the armistice we have treated the Russians as if they had been our enemies all their lives, as if they had been upon the side of the enemy, as if they had wounded and killed our own during the war. Ingratitude is written upon every page of the history of the Allies toward Russia.

The time came when the Russians, under the inspiration which came out of the preaching of democracy during the Great War, determined to be rid of the old régime, which had brought disaster and suffering to them for 300 years, the old régime which had been more cruel and bloody and longer continued than any régime in Europe. They threw off the rule of the Czar, and then there happened that which always happens when a great people undertake to be rid of old-established customs and systems; chaos, turmoil, suffering, bloodshed, and cruelty followed. There were those who came into power at that time with whose political beliefs we do not agree. They set up a form of government, or proposed form of government, which we believe to be impracticable, which we believe to be in many respects intolerable. But, Mr. President, it was their form of government; it was one of the steps, unfortunate and in many respects indefensible, which people have always taken in these great revolutions, which lead to a different and a better condition of affairs.

Immediately after the armistice the Allies, by reason of the fact, so assigned, of this peculiar form of government, began a policy toward the Russians which I characterize as indefensible, intolerable, inhuman, cruel, and brutal. We are greatly moved to-day by recounting the fact that in Russia there are hundreds of thousands of children dying for want of food; and properly are we moved. I recall the fact, however, when the inhuman and intolerable blockade, after the armistice, was established against Russia, at which we connived; when hospital ships carrying medicine and sustenance and relief to the citizens of Russia were kept out of the ports of Russia. We paid no attention to the dying children of Russia at that time, and raised no voice in their behalf.

The Allies established a system of cruelty and of inhumanity the like of which has not characterized this war or any other war. I venture to call this system by its right name. It was treatment based upon the narrow, intolerant, bigoted policies which have wrought havoc to all Europe during the last three years.

Mr. President, we can not escape a part responsibility for the condition which exists to-day in Russia; we owe it not only to humanity but to charity to change our policy with reference to Russia and the Russian people. They have a government in Russia which has existed for four years, the only government set up after and as the result of the war which has been able to maintain itself single and alone and even against the connivance and conspiracy of the other Governments of Europe.

France upon two separate occasions has assisted in sending military expeditions into Russia for the purpose of further harassing, disturbing, and demoralizing the situation in Russia. The English Government has connived at the policy which has been pursued, and the Government of the United States has either connived at it or has refused to raise a voice in condemnation of it. They have received treatment, harsh and punitive, from the hands of the Allies, which many of the Governments upon the side of the enemy have not received. We owe something, in my opinion, as I said, to humanity to change that policy.

If I had my way about it, I would recognize the government that now exists in Russia. I do not care whether you call it a bolshevik government or what you call it, it is the government de facto, and as such I would recognize it. It may be a government which no people would desire to pattern after under any circumstances or conditions, but no one is compelled to do so. We did business with the old Czar government for 150 years, and a more cruel, inhuman, and bloody government never existed upon the face of the earth.

We do not in the recognition of a government undertake to set up a standard as to what that government shall be. The question is whether it is the de facto government, doing business, transacting business, and governing the affairs of the particular country which it assumes to govern. If we should have done our part two and a half years ago toward Russia, in my humble opinion the condition in Russia would be infinitely better to-day than it is. In my opinion, we could have pursued a policy which would have enabled Russia to buy instead of forcing her to beg.

Who are we feeding with this $20,000,000 of money? We are feeding the bolsheviks, so called. We are feeding people whom we would not recognize. We are taking care of the children of the bolsheviks, the children of those whom two years ago we were willing to see starve and denied even medicine to aid them in their illness.

If, Mr. President, we can tax the taxpayer of this country and take money out of the pockets of the people of this country to feed the people of Russia, their families, and their children, upon what possible theory can we say to the taxpayer that we can not afford to recognize the de facto government of Russia?

Aye, but they say Russia is an economic vacuum. When will it be better under the treatment which it is receiving from the Allies? They say further that Russia has nothing to give us, nothing to trade, nothing to exchange. Very well; perhaps she has not. I do not know. My opinion is to the contrary, but I do not know. However, I do know that the recognition of the government which is striving to establish itself in Russia and which has maintained itself for four years would help to stabilize conditions in Russia, would help to establish a system in Russia under which the people could live and do business. Our course has helped to spread bolshevism.

Why, Mr. President, if we go back to the time of the French Revolution and reread the history of those days and the speeches of Pitt and Fox, we find precisely the same policy pursued toward the French and the French Revolution that we have pursued toward Russia. Mr. Pitt said, in effect, we can not recognize the French Revolution or the leaders of that revolution. It is an armed system. It is a system at war with all established government. It is a system at war with law and order. To recognize it is to put a premium upon it; to recognize it and encourage it is to put a premium upon it, and therefore we can not do so.

But it was over the bloody paths which the French people trod that they finally arrived at the place where they have a stable and a successful free and modern republic. Pitt was answered by the succession of events. Washington, however, wiser, more just, and with broader vision, recognized the new Government, the Revolutionary Government, of France. It illustrates the difference between narrow politicians, time servers, and statesmen able to comprehend the future.

Mr. President, about every 30 days for the last four years we have been advised by certain parts of the press of this country that the bolshevik government, so called, was going to fall. There has come out of Russia, or from closer home, in my judgment, certain propaganda every so often to the effect that the government established in Russia under Lenin and Trotski would disappear within the next few days. It has not disappeared. It has wonderfully changed. It has been greatly modified, in my judgment, all for the better. It has been changed without any assistance from us. It has been modified without any aid from the Allies. It has been changed and modified by reason of conditions which prevail in Russia and by reason of the fact that many of the things which they promulgated were found to be impossible and intolerable and impracticable from every standpoint, just as any revolutionary government starts out as this one did, working itself into more orderly condition and into a more orderly system and ultimately to be established as a reasonable form of government.

I venture the opinion to-day, Mr. President, that whatever government comes finally to be the permanent form of government in Russia will have developed step by step from the bolshevik government, as we term it, and will be the outgrowth of the movement which was begun by the revolution. I do not agree with much that Mr. Lenin advocates, but I regard him as one of the two or three great intellects uncovered by the Great War, and I venture the belief that he will finally lead the Russian people to a form of government which will be a stable government and which, while it may not be as completely a free government and a democratic government as we would like to see, will be infinitely better than the government under which they have lived for the last 150 or 200 years. Indeed, the bolshevik government in its worst hour and under conditions and circumstances where it was most denounced was always a better government than the Czar government. Indeed, Mr. President, it was better for the reason that it had the possibilities within it of becoming ultimately a freer and a more modern government.

During the delivery of Mr. BORAH's speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will not object to the request, with the understanding that after this matter is disposed of the consideration of the unfinished business will be resumed, because I want to make some remarks on it to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps it has no reference to what the Senator desires to say, but there is an agreement to vote on a certain day on the bill which is the unfinished business. However, if the Senator wishes to speak upon it, notwithstanding the unanimous-consent agreement, that is all right.

Mr. FLETCHER. The time has been fixed for voting upon it, but I want to have the unfinished business laid before the Senate when this matter is disposed of. I am perfectly willing to go on with the unfinished business when we have finished with the Russian relief measure, which I think can be concluded in a comparatively short time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

After the conclusion of Mr. BORAH's speech,

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 142) to extend the time within which the special committee on the readjustment of the pay of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service may make its report to Congress.

The message also announced that the House returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 205) relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 1033) regulating the issuance of checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money within the District of Columbia, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. FOCHT, Mr. ZIHLMAN, and Mr. WOODS of Virginia were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4810) to authorize the incorporation of companies to promote trade in China, agreed to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. VOLSTEAD, Mr. DYER, and Mr. SUMNERS of Texas were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 955 of the Revised Statutes by extending the jurisdiction of courts in cases of revivor," in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CASES OF REVIVOR.

Mr. STERLING. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 955 of the Revised Statutes by extending the jurisdiction of courts in cases of revivor." There is no occasion for referring it to the Committee on the Judiciary, before which the measure was formerly pending. It is in fact a reenactment by the House now of a measure that has been enacted before and sent over to the Senate. The Senate made certain amendments. The House then concurred in the amendments, but the enrolling clerk of the House inserted three or four words that should not have gone in and that had been stricken out by the Senate amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object unless it leads to discussion. If it does, I shall have to ask the Senator to withdraw it.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 955 of the Revised Statutes by extending the jurisdiction of courts in cases of revivor" was read the first time by its title and the second time at length and considered as in Committee of the Whole, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That an act entitled "An act to amend section 955 of the Revised Statutes by extending the jurisdiction of courts in cases of revivor," approved November 23, 1921 (Public No. 104), be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 955. When either of the parties, whether plaintiff or petitioner or defendant, in any suit in any court of the United States dies before final judgment the executor or administrator of such deceased party may, in case the cause of action survives by law, prosecute or defend any such suit to final judgment. The defendant shall answer accordingly, and the court shall hear and determine the cause and render judgment for or against the executor or administrator, as the case may require. And if such executor or administrator, having been duly served with a scire facias from the office of the clerk of the court where the suit is depending 20 days beforehand, neglects or refuses to become party to the suit, the court may render judgment against the estate of the deceased party in the same manner as if the executor or administrator had voluntarily made himself a party. The executor or administrator who becomes a party as aforesaid shall, upon motion to the court, be entitled to a continuance of the suit until the next term of said court.

"The provisions of this section shall apply to suits in equity and in admiralty as well as to suits at law, and the jurisdiction of all courts of the United States shall extend to and over executors and administrators of any party who dies before final judgment or decree, appointed under the laws of any State or Territory of the United States, and such courts shall have jurisdiction within two years from the date of the death of the party to the suit to issue its scire facias to executors and administrators appointed in any State or Territory of the United States, which may be served in any judicial district by the marshal thereof: Provided, however, That no executor or administrator shall be made a party unless such service is made before final settlement and distribution of the estate of said deceased party to the suit."

"SEC. 2. That the provisions of section 955 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by this act shall apply to suits in which any party has deceased prior to the passage of this amendatory act as well as to suits in which any party may die hereafter."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, one Senate amendment struck out these words from House bill 6053:

To and over foreign executors and administrators of any party who dies before final judgment or decree equal with their jurisdiction over executors and administrators appointed under the laws of the State within which the judicial district of the court in which the action is pending.

Mr. KING. This is for the purpose of reviving actions?

Mr. STERLING. It is a revivor bill.

Mr. KING. Unquestionably, if it passed the Senate, it was a meritorious measure and should have been accepted by the House without any interlineation or amendment.

Mr. STERLING. It was accepted by the House, but by mistake the enrolling clerk of the House, after the amendments of the Senate had been concurred in, inserted words that had been stricken out. These are the words that were inserted by the enrolling clerk of the House by mistake:

In which the action is pending.

Those words should have been omitted.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, if the joint resolution is going to take up some time, I shall have to object.

Mr. KING. I think that we should adopt the suggestion of the Senator from South Dakota by passing the joint resolution of the House.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN RUSSIA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it is not a question of what we would like to do. It is a question of what we are sworn to do and ought to do. It is not a question of feeding a starving child at my door with my bread. It is a question of taking what belongs to somebody else without the consent of the person who owns the bread and giving it to some one else's starving child leaving your own to starve.

Mr. President, the purposes for which we can levy taxes upon the American people are well understood.

We can, of course, tax the American people to support the Government, to pay its debts, to provide for its defense, and to promote the general welfare of our people. That is our oath. Not a line in the Constitution can be cited in support of charity work for foreign countries.

The time was when the city of Savannah, Ga., was swept away by fire. A petition came here to Congress for Federal aid. That was during the first years of the Republic. Congress said: "No; we are sorry for you; you are standing in the ashes of your homes; many of you are starving; our hearts go out to you; if we could, we would relieve your distress; but Congress is bound to make a certain disposition of the trust funds which are committed to it by the American taxpayer, and we can not extend the helping hand to the city of Savannah."

So late as the administration of Mr. Cleveland a bill was passed through both Houses of Congress appropriating a few thousand dollars with which to buy cotton seed to replant the wasted fields of Texas. A drought had destroyed the growing plants, and the people had no seed with which to replant in the largest cotton-growing State of this Union. President Cleveland interposed his veto and killed the bill; and in the histories of this country he is praised for having done so.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia of course knows, however, that since then Congress has enacted legislation, which has been approved by the President, for buying seed for other sections of the country.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia possibly did not understand the drift of what I was saying, or perhaps I did not make it sufficiently clear. It is this: That up to a certain period, so recent as the Presidency of Mr. Cleveland, Congress refused, or the President vetoed and then Congress refused, to supply one of the States of this Union with seed with which to replant the staple crop which that State produced in greater amount than any other State in the Union, my own State of Georgia being next, as the Senator from Virginia will remember.

During the Presidency of Mr. Roosevelt, of course—and I think that was the first time—when there was an earthquake in the English and French West Indian islands, Mr. Roosevelt, as I remember, recommended an appropriation of $800,000 for the purchase of food to be sent down there.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Georgia refers to the earthquake in Martinique?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes; I did not mention the name of the islands, but they were both French and English; Jamaica and Martinique were both involved in the earthquake. Mr. Roosevelt recommended an appropriation to send food down there; and the very first native who came up the gangplank after the ships anchored in Martinique offered to sell American sailors some food. Jamaica and Martinique both are islands where nature feeds men, women, and children.

The appropriation, which was made on the recommendation of Mr. Roosevelt, was the beginning. Afterwards we had our marines to build and to set up in Sicily 2,200 houses for the Italians. The Italians would not even help put the houses up, but the marines had to take them from New York and put them up in Sicily.

Mr. President, coming now to the Russian situation, I should like to know upon what principle we select two American products and say we will invest $20,000,000 in those products and give them away to Russia because the Russian Government and the Russian people have been badly treated by our Government and by the other Governments of Europe. What sort of an argument is that? Are we to become the great international almshouse? Are we to feed the suffering and the famine stricken throughout the earth? If so, why not send foodstuffs to India? Where would the matter end? How could we ever put a stop to it? One precedent after another would soon have the force of law.

In this country we read every day of ex-service men falling on the streets exhausted, having sought work and found none; we read of increasing numbers of suicides because of despair and unemployment and poverty; we read of cruel evictions, landlords putting tenants out; we read of desolation throughout the South, and I know exactly what that condition is. It is a desperate condition. What our people are to do next year, I do not know.

The Federal Government owes my people, right now, $58,000,000 for the illegal cotton tax levied in 1867. That tax was just as illegal as the law would be if the Federal Government should now lay a tax on wheat or corn. Every session of Congress finds us knocking at the door, asking the Federal Government to be just to us and return that money, and now would be a good time to do it, when we have got $20,000,000 to give away in charity work in Russia.

It is said that children in Russia are eating mud; that they are starving. If the children there are eating mud to-day, our help comes too late. If this is a thing that should have been done at all, it ought to have been done long ago. The food will come too late. How long, I pray you, will $20,000,000 worth of wheat and corn feed the Russian people, or feed even the sufferers? It can not be anything but a temporary relief; there is nothing permanent about it.

Mr. President, feeling that this bill is totally unwarranted by the Constitution, I would not have any right as a custodian of trust funds, the people's money, to vote it away in this manner in a foreign charity.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, as I listened to the speeches to-day, and they have all been excellent, varying emotions surged within me. Some Senators say this measure, if enacted into law, would not be constitutional, but the bill is institutional.

I sometimes believe that chloroform or some other anesthetic falls upon us in this Capitol, else what could make us so oblivious to what is going on in our own country as well as in other countries. Mr. President, during the past 10 years we have seen some strange mutations. In that decade changes more remarkable and radical took place on this earth than took place in the 200 years preceding. Even the processes of thought, the customs and views of the peoples, have changed, and whether we would or would not prefer the old days that we knew before far fourteen (1914) we could not return to such standards if we tried.

We are living in a new earth and must adjust ourselves to the conditions.

We are told that thousands of people are starving in Russia. Doubtless that is true. We are told that we are inhibited by the Constitution from appropriating money for the purpose proposed. Doubtless that would be true according to the way the Constitution was interpreted, and correctly interpreted, 45 or 50 years ago; but the Constitution, sir, is not a dead hand; it is flexible. It has been stretched to protect every dollar in our land, and I insist that it shall be stretched to protect every person in our land.

Mr. President, we will find refuge to-day from the upbraidings of our national conscience by voting $20,000,000 to relieve Russia; but I fear when we examine closely we may find in that act but a scant refuge for our conscience.

The United States is a fountain, not a cistern; her open hand is a horn of plenty. The United States must and will take her place as the leader of the nations. Destiny compels her, requires her, to take that wondrous place. It is right and proper to listen to Russia's cry of anguish and despair, but before America can be generous, Mr. President, she must be just.

A Chinese philosopher once sent for his students to gather about him and tell him which in their opinion was the greatest of the virtues; he found them divided as to whether generosity or justice was the greater. The other virtues had comparatively no votes when the students were delivering their opinions. There was a tie vote between generosity and justice, and, breaking the tie, he said to them, "You must be just before you are generous. You can not be generous without first being just."

I shall vote for this appropriation, and I believe that America as the leader of all the nations has come at last to know that there is an ethnic unity of the human race and that the distress of one nation must be a concern of all the others.

Now, let us examine and see if we have been just toward those whose sacrifices have made our country so powerful for good in the affairs of men.

How cynical, how tragic it would be to appropriate $20,000,000 for starving Russians and then refuse to appropriate the modest and much needed sum of $100,000 to aid the Department of Labor in securing employment for our unemployed men. Workingmen in America are not asking a largess or a gift from the Treasury; they are pleading for an opportunity to get a job and earn their bread. So I shall offer to this bill an amendment which passed the Senate on the 12th instant, and which amendment Senate conferees manfully struggled to save, same being an amendment appropriating $100,000 to be used by the Secretary of Labor in securing employment for the unemployed here in the United States.

Moreover, Mr. President, how may we lay the flattering unction to our soul, how can we say on Christmas Day, "We have done a glorious thing by sending $20,000,000 to Russia," when we remember that ex-service men are suffering from tuberculosis, and in many, too many, cases are without help or mercy.

The Senate on the 12th instant agreed to my amendment appropriating $1,000,000 for the further hospitalization of ex-service men afflicted with tuberculosis, yet that amendment, which was added to the deficiency bill, was abandoned in conference. The blame, however, does not rest upon the Senate, for this body did all within its power to save the amendment.

If we desire to serve America, if we want to keep her in the paths of progress, let us not neglect those who made possible our peace and our progress.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is not known as an orator, who makes no pretensions to oratory, really established himself to-day as an orator by his speech. In clear, convincing language he pointed out what destiny has cast upon us as to our duty to aid Russia; but are we going to say when the Christmas bells are ringing that we have $20,000,000 for Russia, but not a penny to aid the American workingman in securing a position; that we have money for Russia, but that the American soldier who carried our stainless banner to new glory may die a death of neglect because, forsooth, bureaucracy says the soldier is already taken care of, and that a bureaucracy must never be questioned?

Mr. President, German gas and German bullets slew their thousands of our boys and American red tape is slaying its thousands more.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ASHURST. I gladly yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I suggest to the Senator from Arizona that these wheat ships and corn ships could not get to Russia for several weeks, even if this bill passes; but if our Government would recognize that of Russia, she has available wealth in the Baku oil fields sufficient to feed every man, woman, and child in Russia practically forever, and that relief could be given by cablegram within 48 hours.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his interruption.

I am not going to delay this bill. On the 2d day of November I laid before the Senate the facts as to the necessity of further hospitalization of soldiers afflicted with tuberculosis, who are pouring into the Southwest by the score. The local authorities have gone to their limit in trying to aid. The humanitarian and the generous people of the Southwest have given from their private purses until they are practically no longer able to give; and yet, inert, somnolent, bound by red tape, we serenely sit here while these poor boys are shamefully neglected. We are told by bureaucracy, which worships red tape, that "we are taking care of them." Ask the dying boys if they are being taken care of. Do not ask some bureaucrat. I ask that my amendment may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is already an amendment pending. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL].

Mr. JONES of Washington. What is the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from South Carolina will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On line 11, page 1, it is proposed to strike out "$20,000,000," and in lieu thereof to insert "$10,000,000."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to say just a word. Has the Senator from Arizona given up the floor?

Mr. ASHURST. No; I have not, Mr. President, but I will yield, of course.

Mr. KENYON. I did not know just how the Senator could hold the floor and still have us vote on the amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. I will yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to say just a word on the general proposition involved in this bill. I would not do so, I think, had it not been that so many Senators have challenged the constitutionality of this measure; and it seems to be assumed by a good many Senators that the bill is entirely unconstitutional, but they say that they will vote for it anyhow.

I am rather sorry to hear Senators make the statement on the floor of this body that they will vote for a bill even though they think in their own minds that it is unconstitutional. Realizing the obligation that a man takes here when he becomes a Senator, I have tried to follow a course of action of abiding by the Constitution, and never voting for anything that I believed was unconstitutional. I do not believe that this bill is unconstitutional. In my judgment, no Senator is driven to take that position; and if he does think so, it is amazing to me how he can vote for the bill.

The constitutionality of this measure can be sustained on two grounds, at least. One I have referred to before, when the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] was asking the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] some questions. It can be sustained under the general welfare clause of the Constitution. I know that is a clause of the Constitution that is abused a great deal but in this case it is plain. This is a gift; it is a philanthropy, but, at the same time, it serves a double purpose. Like mercy, "It blesseth him that gives and him that takes." But in this giving there is, as suggested by the Senator from Nebraska and others, a clear benefit to the entire country.

The Senator from New York rather makes fun of the idea that it will increase the price of corn, contending that it will not increase it more than perhaps a cent or two a bushel, or 3 or 4 cents a bushel. If it did that, Mr. President, it would be a tremendous benefit to the farmers of this country. Even an increase in the price of corn of 2 or 3 cents a bushel would start things on the road to prosperity or normalcy, whatever that may be.

Not only that, but we have an illustration in the case of Liberty bonds. The Government was buying only a small proportion, almost an infinitesimal part, of the issue of Liberty bonds, but that helped to stimulate the market for Liberty bonds and helped to raise the price of Liberty bonds. It is merely helpful; but the farmers of this country are looking for anything, grasping at anything which may be helpful to them in the most demoralized and paralyzed condition they have been in since the Civil War.

So that we have the argument, for this appropriation, of its being for the general welfare. That satisfies my mind on the constitutional question.

Secondly, not as clear, I think, and perhaps a little chimerical and perhaps a little dreamy, is this argument—the civilization of the whole world may be involved in a proposition of this kind. I agree with many of the things the Senator from New York has said about precedent, but there is no precedent for this situation. I think since the days of the Pharaohs, at least, there has never been anything to equal this condition in Russia, and in setting a precedent, and determining what Congress shall do, we will have to be governed by the circumstances of each particular case. Pestilence follows famine. No one knows what pestilence may come out of this famine. No one knows how it may affect world civilization. No one knows how that may spread to this country. If a fire is coming through a town, we do not wait until the fire gets to the buildings; we go down and stop it before it gets very far. That may follow in this case. We are a part of the world civilization. It affects us as a part of that civilization, and really its fairest flower, if the civilization of the world is going down.

I grant that is not a very appealing argument, even in my own mind, on the constitutional question, but the other argument I have made is—and I would be willing to stretch our power a good deal—not violating our oaths, not going against the Constitution, to find something of a constitutional argument on which to hang the proposition of saving people from starvation.

I noted what the Senator said about public charity, whether we are going to turn over the handling of private charity to the Government. I have talked with Mr. Hoover, who has probably done greater work than any man in the whole world for suffering humanity, about this very thing. I know his viewpoint is that you could not go out in this country and raise $2,000,000 to help those starving Russians, millions of whom will die this winter. The Senator from New York said that either we do not care or we can not afford it. We can afford it. With all the talk of hard times, certain classes of the people of this country are rolling in wealth. I do not believe we do not care, but the people are indifferent. They have had so many of these things presented to them that they have grown tired of them, and they do not believe the stories. You could not raise this money by private donation. Just how far Congress can go to compel people to be charitable is a hard thing to say. We are getting into a very hard realm of conjecture on that question.

I wish the Senator had followed along a little further on that very point, Mr. Hoover's testimony, part of which I want to place in the RECORD. He said:

> Some question has been raised in here and elsewhere as to our own economic situation not warranting our extending relief abroad. I would like to discuss it from two points of view. The first is whether we can afford it. In a general way this country is spending something like $1,000,000,000 a year on tobacco, cosmetics, ice cream, and other nonessentials of that character.

What are we spending on theater tickets in this country? The people are flocking to the theaters of this country every night. Tickets are sold for as high as $4 apiece in some of the New York theaters. If we were willing to give up half of what is spent on theaters in this country, it would save these ten or fifteen million people in Russia from starvation. If we were willing to give up what is spent on tobacco, it would help; we can not force people to do it, but if a little spirit of self-sacrifice were shown, if the people would give up half of what is spent on tobacco in this country, if men were willing to give up half of the cigars they smoke a day, and the women half of the cigarettes, it would afford enough money to keep the Russians from starvation for some period of time.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. KENYON. I hesitate to do so, Mr. President, when I observe the smile on the Senator's face, but I yield.

Mr. DIAL. I would be glad to have the Senator start a fund of that kind. I would contribute to it.

Mr. KENYON. I am sure that if the Senator would give up half of the cigars that he smokes a day, it would help out a great deal; but I have not observed any concerted movement around the country in that direction.

Mr. Hoover said further:

> It does not look to be a very great strain on the population to take $20,000,000 for a purpose of this kind. If our own people suffer, we surely possess also the resources to care for them. It has also another economic bearing. The food supplies that we wish to take to Russia are all in surplus in the United States, and are without a market in any quarter of the globe.

I have referred to that, that it will not accomplish a great deal in an economic way.

I suppose it is true that we are all swayed somewhat by some emotion in this matter and by a desire to help these people. We have gone through a Thanksgiving season, and among certain classes of the people there have been well-supplied tables and among other classes there was little food on the tables. We are coming to a Christmas time. There will be enormous sums of money spent on Christmas presents, some useful and some foolish. There will be food upon the tables of those who could afford to give for charity, people stuffing themselves until the only result is a beneficial one for the doctors. Of course it is a personal matter with everyone, but if we could forego some of these pleasures and spend the money for this purpose, we could solve this thing by private charity. That can not be done, so that we must come, as the Senator from New York has said, to public charity.

I do not know how the people can read the evidence offered by Gov. Goodrich, who has given such splendid work to this cause, and Mr. Hoover, and others, of the suffering in Russia in the Volga Valley and enjoy their Thanksgiving or their Christmas dinners if they have not done something to help.

On Christmas day there will be a little stranger at the table of everybody who reads this evidence. The stranger will be in the minds of all, and they can not get away from it; it will be a poor, little, helpless, starving child of Russia. It is all right to talk about educating them; that is a good plan when it can be accomplished, but you can not present a little algebra or geometry in place of something to eat to a poor, little, struggling, hardly able to sit up in school child.

That is the situation. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is exactly right about a lot of the things he has said. We are going to have trouble in this country, but we are going to take care of it, and people are not going to be permitted to starve in this country while others are rolling in wealth. I am sorry that provision for $100,000 for the unemployment agency went out in conference. If it had not been that the payment to the soldiers the next day was involved in the matter, I would have been glad to have stood with the Senator from Arizona and defeated the conference report. The Senate will have to take such a stand some time, instead of always yielding to what the House conferees demand.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, as one of the conferees, I assure the Senator that if it had not been for the necessity of the appropriation being available on the 15th, the Senate conferees would not have agreed to the report.

Mr. KENYON. I am sure they would not have agreed to it, and I hope the day will soon come when the conferees on the part of the Senate will stand up and fight that proposition out.

Every Senator sympathizes with what the Senator from Arizona says about the soldiers, and we will give the last dollar of appropriation necessary to help the soldiers. But that really is not the issue here. We have a distinct, concrete proposition here, which we ought to dispose of, and, Mr. President, I will take my chances with the people of the State of Iowa, as their representative, in part, in this body, in voting for this sum of money to help the people of Russia.

Some people say it will bolster up the bolshevik government. These poor little children have nothing to do with the bolshevik government. However much we may condemn it, I am inclined to agree with what has been said here to the effect that it is going to prove a destructive force to the bolshevik government, because they have been told that the great United States is merely a capitalistic Nation, has no humanity and no heart. Now we are showing them what we can do in humanitarian ways, that the great Republic of the West has a heart.

Mr. President, we are a great Christian Nation. We pride ourselves on it. There is a chance for nations as well as individuals to practice Christianity. We can do it here in a perfectly constitutional way. We can carry out the thought and the command of the Master, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." So we serve these people, we serve our own people, we serve the glory of America, and we serve the civilization of the world.

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, with regard to the question of the constitutionality of this proposed measure, I think we ought always to remember that the Supreme Court never holds a statute to be unconstitutional unless it is clearly so; that is, every doubt is resolved in favor of the constitutionality of a statute. In other words, it must plainly appear that a statute is unconstitutional before it is held to be void, and that should be so under our system of government.

A statute is a legislative act of Congress when signed by the Executive, and its constitutionality can not be questioned unless it is clearly a violation of the organic law of the land. Now, can it be said that this appropriation is clearly unconstitutional? I am aware that the general welfare clause of the Constitution should not be pushed too far. Like all other abstract terms, it may be abused. But it is in the Constitution and it should be applied in appropriate cases.

Economically speaking, Mr. President, the world is interdependent. Our prosperity is dependent upon the prosperity of the great Empire of Russia. Our general welfare economically is directly connected with the welfare of the Russian people.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. COLT. For a question, if the Senator please. I have only a word or two more to say.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It is a question. If our national prosperity or welfare is dependent upon Russia, why does not our Government recognize the government of Russia?

Mr. COLT. I am dealing with the specific question before us, and not with the form of the present government of Russia.

It may be said further that the present situation in Russia is the direct outgrowth of the Great War in which we took a part. The present condition of that country is one of the results of that war, and I am inclined to think that we have a certain responsibility in trying to bring about peace conditions after war has ceased, the same kind of responsibility that we had in carrying on the war. I admit the connection is not very close, but in a war in which we took part to save civilization, great governments were overthrown and the people are suffering and can not recover economically without our assistance. As a great world power, is there anything written in the Constitution of the United States that we should refuse aid?

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. COLT. I yield.

Mr. SHIELDS. Does the Senator as a lawyer say that the Congress of the United States has the power to do a thing because it is not forbidden by the Constitution?

Mr. COLT. I did not intend to make such a statement.

Mr. SHIELDS. I misunderstood the statement just made, then. Is not this really the situation? Let me put it to the Senator in this way—that in order for it to be constitutional for Congress to do anything, the legislator must put his finger upon the clause of the Constitution authorizing it. The contrary rule prevails in the States. If one says the act of a general assembly of a State is void because unconstitutional, then he has to put his finger upon the clause in the State constitution that prohibits it or in the Federal Constitution whereby that power has been taken away from the State. But in the Federal Government if we say an act is constitutional, we have to put our finger directly upon the clause of the Constitution that authorizes it.

Mr. COLT. I concede that the Senator from Tennessee is correct. The Government of the United States is a Government of limited powers, and any power exercised by Congress must find its authority in the express or implied language of the Constitution. If I made any statement which seemed broader, I withdraw it.

I did not rise to argue the question at length. I simply desired to say that it seems to me there are several grounds upon which we might relieve the doubts of those who think that the bill is possibly unconstitutional, as being a mere gift of money to a foreign people. In the first place, there is the ground suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and others that this money is not to be a gift but is to be invested in products of this country, to the great benefit of our farmers and hence to the public benefit of our people; secondly, as I have already urged, there is an economic interdependence between the nations of the earth, and hence the general welfare of the United States is dependent upon the economic conditions prevailing in other countries, and this is especially true in the case of Russia, owing to her vast territory and immense population.

I might imagine, for instance, that Canada were in the situation of Russia and called for an appropriation of this kind. Would we deny it to the Canadian people? Again, as bearing upon the subject, I do think that the present condition of Russia is an outgrowth of a war in which we took part, and that we ourselves have helped to overthrow that great Empire, and in so doing have led to its present condition. In other words, the problems of peace are greater than the problems of war and the problems of peace clothe us also with responsibilities equal to those of war.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if, when the framers of our Constitution wrote it, they were speaking of the general welfare of the people of the United States or of the people of Russia? Then I should like to ask him if it is not true——

Mr. COLT. Mr. President, they were speaking of whatever concerned the general welfare of the people of the United States. Foreign matters may concern and have an intimate connection with our general welfare. It is very fortunate that the Constitution uses these abstract terms because they are elastic and, as said by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], as the country moves and as the world moves these abstract phrases in the Constitution must be interpreted in the light of fundamental conditions of society, for if the Constitution is not elastic enough to supply the great fundamental wants of society the Constitution will break or we will have a revolution. I do not mean that as an extreme statement. I mean that the framers of the Constitution used general phrases and abstract expressions for the very purpose that the statutes that we passed might conform to the march of the United States and its people in its upward movement to a higher civilization.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I should also like to ask the Senator if it is not true that when the Supreme Court of the United States assumes an act to be constitutional, they also assume that this branch of the Government did its duty and remained within the Constitution?

Mr. COLT. They do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] to reduce the appropriation from $20,000,000 to $10,000,000.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, some Senators have come into the Chamber who were not here during my short speech a few moments ago. I again say that the two amendments which I am going to propose were adopted by the Senate without a dissenting voice on the 12th of this month. One is to appropriate $100,000 to be used by the Department of Labor in the procuring of positions and jobs for men. The President's conference on unemployment recommended an appropriation of $400,000 which Gen. Dawes reduced to $200,000, and the Senate appropriated $100,000. Our Senate conferees I have reason to believe manfully stood by the amendment and tried to secure its adoption, but were unable to do so.

My second amendment is practically a rescript of the one adopted by the Senate on the 12th day of this month. That amendment appropriates $1,000,000 for the further hospitalization of former soldiers. I propose to reduce that to $500,000 and lodge the authority to acquire and build new hospitals with the Secretary of the Treasury and not with the Veterans' Bureau.

I have explained as briefly as I can the two amendments, and I now offer the one with reference to augmenting the facilities in the Department of Labor.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The READING CLERK. Add to the bill a new section as follows:

SEC. 2. To enable the Secretary of Labor, during the present unemployment emergency, to augment the existing facilities of the United States Employment Service in facilitating the transportation of labor from one State to another, inform States in which there is scarcity of labor of the situation in States where there is surplus of labor of the kind desired, and securing, compiling, and publishing information on unemployment throughout the country, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and for their actual necessary traveling expenses while absent from their official station, together with their per diem in lieu of subsistence, allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914; rent of quarters outside of the District of Columbia; supplies and equipment, telegraph and telephone service, and printing and binding, $100,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I was not, as the Senator from Arizona knows, one of the conferees on the recent deficiency appropriation bill. I am going to make a frank statement to the Senator when I say that so far as I am concerned I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment upon the pending bill, but with the distinct understanding that I shall yield rather than let the Russian relief matter go over until after the holidays. If we can come to an agreement before Thursday night and get the bill ready for the signature of the President, with the amendment included, well and good, but I shall yield, as one of the conferees on the part of the Senate, before I will let the bill go over beyond Thursday. I think it is due the Senator from Arizona that I should make this statement now; and it also applies to the other amendment which I understand he will offer.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand that the conferees on the part of the House on a prior occasion refused to accept this amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. They may not be the same conferees, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In view of the Senator's announcement made a moment ago, I can not see that this amendment has the slightest chance of becoming a part of the bill. All that will be necessary, in view of his announcement, will be for the House conferees to say, "We object," and the Senate conferees will yield.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I will say to the Senator that if the House conferees will accept it, well and good, but I do not want to have it understood that we are going to carry this emergency relief measure over beyond the holidays in that event. I do not think the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] would ask that that should be done, because he knows that Russian children to-day are living upon grass and roots. We do not meet after the holidays until January 3, and every day in the meantime means a loss of lives. Therefore I want to have it understood that we shall do what we can, but that we will yield before we will allow the bill to fail.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, whatever faults one may find in the Senator from Utah—and he has his faults, as we all have—a lack of frankness is not one of them. He says—and he is correct if this bill does not become a law—children in Russia will perish. That is true, and I say if my amendment does not become a law, American citizens will perish here. The despondent, the disconsolate, who are out of money and out of work, looking not for charity, gifts, or a largess, but looking for work, will perish in spirit if not in body. No appropriation that could be made, nothing that could be done, would be more welcome to the people of this country than an appropriation to enable the Department of Labor to secure, if possible, positions and jobs for the unemployed.

I have said before, and I repeat, that if this amendment is defeated, if the hand of the Department of Labor shall be paralyzed in its laudable endeavor to secure work for men in order that they may earn their daily bread, the blame will not be on the Senate.

Mark you closely to what I now say. This Government does not owe anyone a living; he who being able to work says that the Government owes him a living is the idler, the malingerer, and the grafter; but the Government does owe every person a chance to earn a decent living, and the government that does not secure to each citizen a fair chance to earn a living will soon drift into troubled waters.

I shall at the appropriate time offer another amendment—somewhat similar to the amendment I offered to the deficiency bill, which amendment was adopted by the Senate but lost in the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses—appropriating a reasonable sum of money to be placed at the disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury to enable him to extend full hospitalization to ex-service men; then when these two amendments shall have been adopted and the bill passed we shall feel the glowing and expanding of soul that comes to those who have done their full duty.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I agree with practically everything that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has said. I was heartily in favor of this amendment in committee and was glad that it passed the Senate. The amendment ought to become a law. I do not, however, believe that we ought to complicate the pending proposition by the amendment. If we are in favor of providing relief for the starving children in Russia, we ought to do so without trying to couple with it a proposition concerning any situation existing in this country or delaying it for one moment. For that reason I shall vote against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the pending bill why it is that the proposed relief is restricted to corn, to seed grain, and to milk? If the object and purpose of the bill is to afford some prompt relief for starving people in Russia, why restrict it to corn, to seed grain, and to milk?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I had no hand in drafting the bill, but I really think the reason for using the language to which the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] refers, although I have not asked anyone in reference to it, was that there can be obtained from corn and rye more real sustenance than from any other products of the farm. As to milk, which is, of course, of the preserved variety, that is to be for the children, and it is a very necessary article of diet, as the Senator from Florida knows. I think the bill as reported will cover the situation.

I will be frank with the Senator, however, and say I not only think that, but there is more of an overproduction of corn in the United States than there is of any other grain. I think corn needs a market, more than does any other grain or food which is produced. I also think corn can be more easily and safely transported than can any other grain. Therefore, I think whoever prepared the bill prepared it in the proper way.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Does not the Senator think that if the people of Russia are starving and suffering and the poor children are crying for a morsel of bread we should give them some food and some clothing which they could utilize, and that we should do so immediately instead of sending over the crude product of corn? After they get the corn it will have to go through the milling process and have to be prepared for distribution. Corn alone does not constitute a practical diet even for starving people. Why restrict the proposal to one article of food besides milk?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will assure the Senator from Florida that corn when it arrives will prevent starvation. So far as clothing is concerned, I suppose the Senator from Florida is aware of the fact that there have been, I will not say shiploads, but carloads of old clothing gathered from different parts of the United States and sent to Russia. It is not clothing so much as food that the Russian people want right now. The people who live in the Volga Basin to-day must receive food or else they will starve to death. There is no other alternative. It seems to me that if the corn and rye shall be delivered there there will be no question that the people in that region will live upon it, and will live much better, perhaps, than they have lived for the last three or four years.

Mr. TRAMMELL. This bill, as I understand, does not provide for anything for food except corn and milk. It does not provide for grain to be used as food according to the provisions of the bill, but provides for seed grain for planting purposes and not for food purposes. Therefore, it restricts the diet to be given to the starving people in Russia to corn and a little milk. If we want to help them, why is it proposed to restrict the relief to be afforded in that way?

Mr. SMOOT. I think if the Senator from Florida were in the same condition as are the Russian people who live in the Volga Basin he would be mighty thankful for corn.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I would be mighty thankful, Mr. President, of course, for anything.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly the situation in which the Russian people are.

Mr. TRAMMELL. But when the Government in its charity and in its beneficence, with a heart that is touched to the utmost, goes out to try to help a starving people, why not give them something that will afford them quick relief? Why not give them a little more palatable diet, and not restrict the relief afforded to corn?

Mr. SMOOT. Would the Senator want us to send over there turkeys and plum puddings and grapefruit and articles of that kind?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Nobody has suggested that that should be done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, if the Senator will read the testimony before the House committee he will find an explanation there why it is deemed best to send corn. Gov. Goodrich, of Indiana, who came directly from the afflicted regions, stated that corn would do. When the question was put to him whether there would be time enough to have it ground after it got there, he said that as soon as the people of the valley of the Volga know that the food is on the way those who have plenty will help take care of those who would otherwise starve, knowing that more is coming. They have ample facilities for grinding the corn.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Florida will permit me, what facilities have they?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They have their local mills.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know whether they have mills, but why should they have mills that will grind corn when they raise no corn, as I understand. Mills to grind corn must be wholly different from those which grind wheat.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator realizes that there is already in operation over there a certain organized effort in charge of Americans, and those Americans on the spot bear undisputed testimony to the fact that corn, which is the cheapest food, will be sufficient if sent over there in ample quantities and that it can be ground after it arrives there. We have got to take their testimony as being sufficient. A bushel of corn, I presume, weighs something like 60 pounds, and a bushel may be purchased for 50 cents, so that the price is less than a cent a pound in its present form. The children and grown people in the affected regions, who are being fed, are only fed perhaps one or at most two meals a day, but that is enough to carry them through, and added to what is available there will be sufficient. The Senator from Florida certainly would not favor any extravagant use of money. It is a question of getting the most food possible to the most people. I think we ought to take the testimony of those who are already on the ground and who have sent a representative to America who has testified before the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, of course, I would not favor any extravagance.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, will the Senator indulge me in order that I may ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator has read all the testimony and is familiar with the facts. I will ask him where is this suffering? Is it in all of Russia or just in the Volga region?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is in what is known as the Volga Basin, a territory as large, perhaps, as two of our average States, inhabited by 18,000,000 people. The starvation that is prevailing there first affects the poorer people. Those who have means are able to buy from neighboring territory. Last year the crop in that region was only about one-seventh of normal and the year before I think it was one-ninth of normal. They have now, however, a good prospect for a crop next year, as they have had rains. The failure of the crop this year was due largely to drought; in fact, to three successive droughts.

Mr. SHIELDS. So they have suffered from the loss of their grain crops?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. In a territory equal to about two of the ordinary States of the Union, or, say, 100,000 square miles?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. My impression is that the area is something like that of two ordinary States of the Union, or in the neighborhood of 100,000 square miles. I can not speak accurately as to the extent of the stricken area.

Mr. SHIELDS. Russia in Europe has now an area of about a million square miles, has it not?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not know the exact figures.

Mr. SHIELDS. Are the remaining portions of Russia unable to contribute? There is in European Russia probably a territory equivalent to 25 or 30 States of the United States. Has all that territory been affected by the drought, so that no part of it is able to contribute to the suffering sections?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The testimony shows that there are large portions of Russia where there is a shortage of crops; but I am only speaking of the Volga Basin, where the crop is almost a total failure and where it was a total failure last year.

Mr. SMOOT. And the year before.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Possibly for three years in succession there has been drought. That has devastated an enormous region. It is a greater region than Russia, even with a high-grade government, would possibly be able to rescue, and I suppose we ourselves in this country, with an abundance, would hardly be able to provide adequate relief in such a vast area. However, the organization which has already gone in there has transported food by the trainload; everything has been placed at their disposal; no charge is made upon the Russian railroads, and the complete control of the matter has been placed in American hands. So converted has the Russian Government become to this altruistic effort on the part of American agents that Gov. Goodrich stated that it imposed the death penalty on any Russian caught pilfering the supplies or interfering with the distribution. So the organization is already established, relief is already in progress, and what they already have on hand will be sufficient to save the lives of 1,200,000 children until next September, when the next harvest will come in.

Mr. SHIELDS. What I have been trying to get at is that the region which is affected by this terrible condition is a very restricted area compared to the whole of Russia, which in area is about three times greater than the United States. It is considered one of the greatest of countries in its resources. It is a great wheat country. It is right there at the doors of Rumania. It was at one time said to be the granary of Europe, and especially is the Volga country, not far from Rumania. With that immense territory, why is it that they have come across the Atlantic Ocean to get sustenance for an infinitesimal part of the Empire? It does not look to me as though their brothers over there are doing very much for them, or are animated very much by charitable motives.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I answer that from the testimony?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. Former Senator BURTON, who was on the committee in the House, asked the same question that the Senator is asking. Here was the answer of Dr. Kellogg, who was over there on the commission. He says:

> The situation is simply incredible to one who has not seen it; indescribable even by one who has seen it. I have seen nothing like it in my six years of experience in the food-shortage regions of Europe.

He speaks of Poland then:

> There are at least 15,000,000 people in the famine region of the Volga—

That is the one we are reaching—> while around that famine region is a food-shortage region including 15,000,000 more.

The witness continues:

> Senator BURTON, there is not food enough in the surrounding region to keep the people alive, let alone any to send into the famine regions.
>
> As Gov. Goodrich has pointed out, there is an agricultural breakdown in Russia which has been becoming more and more serious for the last two or three years. And then on top of this has come a terrible drought, extending over one of the three chief grain-producing regions of Russia; a region which under normal conditions produces food for Moscow and the industrial regions and even for export to other parts of Europe. That food is gone. It is simply a catastrophe.
> The soviet government has tried to bring in food. It has been able to bring in only a very small amount. It has tried to bring in seed. I was there when the Government seed trains came down into the Volga and the seeds were parceled out to the farmers. The farmers took the seed and planted it. I talked with many of them and with many of the officials, and there was no one more optimistic in his statement than to say that they had more than one-fifth of their normal needs for planting. Still they can seed more thinly and thus seed more than one-fifth of a crop.

So that the neighboring territory that would ordinarily send in a food supply is not merely in a bad condition, but is in a condition of agricultural breakdown.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, if the Senator will excuse me there, here is this country with, my recollection is, about eight and a half million square miles, compared to about three and a half million square miles in the United States. It has been a country of great resources, and it has especially been a great wheat country. It has some of the most productive wheat lands in the world. We have all heard of the wheat coming out of the Black Sea, down the Volga and other great rivers that flow into the Black Sea, and that would supply the world if it could get by Turkey's embargo on the Bosphorus. We have been wanting that opened all the time, and, as I have said, Rumania is here at the door; and here is not exceeding a hundred thousand square miles that it is claimed is in trouble because of the drought. It has been three years since the war. If Russia is in trouble, with all of its resources and its fertility, and its 180,000,000 people to cultivate its land, it grows out of the people's own fault, and out of their own idleness. How long are we to say that that country was dislocated in its industry and its agriculture and the habits of the people by the war and send food from America to support it?

Mr. KENYON. The drought certainly was not their own fault. There have been three years of drought.

Mr. SHIELDS. That, I understand, was in the Volga.

As to these exaggerated reports that we have heard from time to time, I am not impeaching the veracity of anyone, but we are familiar with such things. Only a few months ago a report was circulated throughout the United States by the public press that the entire South was starving, that we were dying with pellagra, and that people were starving there for want of sustenance because of the failure of crops. When the report was investigated it was found that there was no truth in it. Those things are exaggerated. That is always done; but I am going to vote against this joint resolution, and I am led to do it by these things:

In the first place, there is absolutely no warrant in the Constitution for it, and I do not understand that anyone here pretends that there is. The fact that we violate the Constitution here nearly every day is no excuse for our keeping it up. I think it is time that we should have some respect for our oaths to support and defend the Constitution. I am not going to make any constitutional argument, however. I do not know of any greater waste of time than that in the United States Congress, though it happens every day.

There is no warrant for the passage of this bill. If we want to spend $20,000,000 in charity, it ought to be spent here with our own people. We need it in some sections, though we are not starving here or anywhere. It has been said that there were 5,000,000 unemployed men in the United States.

I read in yesterday morning's paper that one ex-soldier fell exhausted and fainting on the streets in this city because he could not get employment, and for want of sustenance he was no longer able to stand up. Those things may occur; and if we are going to send $20,000,000 over there we ought to add $20,000,000 for the people of the United States. We ought to be just before we are generous.

Here is this great country of Russia, with 180,000,000 people, with an area three times as great as that of the United States, with just as fertile land, with as great resources of every possible kind in forest, field, and mine. It has been three years since they passed through the terrible trials of the war. If they can ever get on their feet, if they can ever act, if they are ever going to work, if they are ever going to be frugal and going to support themselves it is time that they should do it. If we are to continue to deal in this gush and hysteria about feeding Europe they never will do it. They will continue to allow us to feed them.

Why, Mr. President, it has gotten to be a disease in the United States to send something to Europe, to conjure up some reason to go around and beg for some things to send to Europe. During the war, from the beginning of the war over there, before we ever entered into it and ever since, if one wealthy society woman in New York made a subscription and it was published in the papers almost every other woman in the town fell over herself in trying to go there and make a subscription so as to get her name in the society papers along with it. It is a fad. It is a fashion. Here is one man who ran for the nomination for President of the United States very largely on the money that he raised and sent over to Europe. We have got to get away from it. We have got to take care of our own people and save our own resources for our own country and let these people go to work.

If I knew the facts, I have as much sympathy for starving children as any man in the world, or starving grown people, as far as that is concerned; but I do believe that every nation ought to take care of its own poor as long as it is able to do so. I can not believe that so rich a country as Russia is, so great and so large a country in area and in every possible way, is not able to take care of this small part of its territory, not one-tenth of its whole territory, and this small part of its people, without sending clear across the continent of Europe and the Atlantic Ocean to do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I will ask the Senators in charge of the bill to turn to pages 24 and 25 of the hearings in order that I may get an explanation, if they will be good enough to give it, of some of the statements made in a letter addressed to Mr. Hoover by Gov. Goodrich, the letter having been written to him from Russia under date of November 1, 1921.

I notice that in the second paragraph of the letter he states:

> After getting all the facts I can from the official reports and talking with millers, grain merchants, and men who, by reason of their past connection with the business of the famine district and of Russia in general, are able to give much valuable information, I find that European Russia produced this year from 328 to 350 pounds of grain per capita, a larger amount than the per capita consumption in America.

Now, turning over to the middle of the next page, after reciting in tables certain figures of requirements and production, taken from the soviet government, as I understand, Gov. Goodrich makes this statement:

> If these figures as given out by the soviet government on the 28th of September—

That is, this year—

> are correct, then European Russia has a net surplus of foodstuff. I do not believe there will ever be a day, unless transport utterly breaks down, when food can not be had in Russia, even in the famine districts, if one has the money to buy.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator what he is reading from?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am reading from the hearings.

Mr. SMOOT. This is a letter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A letter written by Gov. Goodrich on November 1. He was then traveling in Russia.

Mr. SHIELDS. Gov. Goodrich was the same witness from whom the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] quoted while I was making some observations, was he not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. SHIELDS. That also appears in the same testimony?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. Just let me go on for another sentence, and read a few figures.

Gov. Goodrich proceeds:

> The following are food prices I got in the bazaars of Kazan, Samara, Saratov, Markstadt, and Balser, in the very heart of the worst of the famine district, and it was all of excellent quality:

	Cents per pound.
Butter	22

It is twice that in the United States.

Bread	9
Sausage	8
Beans	3½
Flour	8
Rice	12–15
Good mutton and beef	3½–4

Mr. McKELLAR. What is the date of that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. November 1.

Mr. McKELLAR. This past November?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Some of those items are twice as cheap as they are in this country.

Mr. SMOOT. What would a cent buy in Russian money? Does the Senator know?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not know what it would buy, but this is the price per pound in cents.

Mr. SMOOT. In United States cents?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; which are at a tremendous premium in Russia.

Mr. KING. I think a dollar is worth perhaps 50,000 or 100,000 rubles.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Perhaps I do not understand the context of this testimony, but I was struck with these figures.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will read the second paragraph of the letter on page 24 he will find that that explains why there is a shortage. It says:

> After getting all the facts I can from the official reports and talking with millers, grain merchants——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have read that.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the paragraph that the Senator read. The next paragraph is as follows:

> The Russian eats but little meat; bread is his staff of life, and he consumes in normal years about 450 to 480 pounds, while the American consumes, as I remember it, from 290 to 330 pounds per capita.

In the preceding paragraph he states that he finds that European Russia produced this year from 328 to 350 pounds of grain per capita; so that every man, woman, and child would fall short under that about 130 pounds; and that is in every district in Russia, taking Russia as a whole and taking every man, woman, and child in it. I want to say to the Senator, however, that the Volga Basin and the surrounding Provinces in Russia are where the great drought occurred, and I do not care what advice we give to those people to go to work; they did go to work, and they did put seed in the ground, but no rain came. There has been a drought for three years, and I would not care if they had worked and hoed and plowed and harvested and done everything they were capable of doing; they could not have raised a crop. The Lord Almighty was the only one who could arrange that, and He arranged otherwise.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, where did all this food come from which Gov. Goodrich says is in Russia, enough to support them? Did I understand the Senator to say that there was food enough in Russia to support all their people?

Mr. SMOOT. He said:

> After getting all the facts I can from the official reports and talking with millers, grain merchants, and men who, by reason of their past connection with the business of the famine district and of Russia in general, are able to give much valuable information, I find that European Russia produced this year from 328 to 350 pounds of grain per capita, a larger amount than the per capita consumption in America.

But in the next paragraph he said:

> The Russian eats but little meat; bread is his staff of life, and he consumes in normal years about 450 to 480 pounds, while the American consumes, as I remember it, from 290 to 330 pounds per capita.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Assuming, then, that the Russian eats nothing but bread, these figures would indicate that his allowance or supply of bread has been decreased 25 per cent, covering all of Russia.

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator from New York a question? He read some figures as to the selling price of food products. Did I understand him to say that those were in the market places in the heart of the famine-stricken district?

Mr. WADSWORTH. According to Gov. Goodrich. I will read it again:

> The following are food prices I got in the bazzars of Kazan, Samara, Saratov, Markstadt, and Balser, in the very heart of the worst of the famine district, and it was all of excellent quality.

Then follow the prices of eight commodities, butter 22 cents a pound, and so on. Of course, there must be some explanation for it, or it destroys the whole case.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is an explanation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is it? That is what I want to get.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That food is obtainable, but only those who have the money can buy it. Most of the peasants there have worked three years without raising a crop, and they have not the money with which to buy it, and they are starving. There can not be a crop failure three years in succession without a large portion of the agricultural population being impoverished, and there is no use in saying to those people who have not any money that food is reasonably cheap.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then why should we not send them money?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think possibly it would be wise to take the recommendation of the men over there. The Senator from New York stands here arguing that there should not be a famine in Russia; yet the fact is that there is a famine there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In a portion of Russia.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator argues that you ought to educate the people over there instead of giving them food; but you can not educate people when they are dying. The statistics in the hearings which the Senator has in his hand show the number of people dying of starvation in each community of the various districts. All the Senator has to do is to read the statement of the facts.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have been endeavoring to read the testimony.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is arguing that there is not any starvation there; yet men come back here and, with tears streaming down their faces, tell the committee of the most pathetic scenes that they witnessed, and they named one community after another where starvation stalks, and hundreds of people are dying; yet the Senator stands there and argues that they ought not to die and ought not to starve.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have not stood here and argued about anything. I am reading from the testimony before the committee, and I said a moment ago, before the Senator from Nebraska became excited about it, that possibly I made a mistake in judging of the context in connection with which this letter of Gov. Goodrich should be considered. But my eye lit upon this sentence, which I think is worthy of explanation. There is probably an explanation for it. This is what Gov. Goodrich says:

I do not believe there will ever be a day, unless transport utterly breaks down, when food can not be had in Russia, even in the famine districts, if one has the money to buy.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator expect peasants who work three years without raising any crops, practically, to have any money to buy anything with? If the Senator lived out in the farming region where I live, he would know what condition they are in after they have failed to raise even one crop.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let the Senator pile two more years of failure on the top of that, and he probably may appreciate that they have not any money with which to buy anything.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I concede that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yet the Senator thinks we ought to educate them; that we ought to put them in schools and teach them algebra and mathematics in various forms.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator can not divert me in that way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is what the Senator has repeated here, that he believes in taking this money and using it to educate people, instead of saving them from starvation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator is endeavoring to divert my attention and that of the Senate from this testimony. This is all I want to know: If it is true that there never will be a day in Russia when food can not be obtained, even in the famine districts, provided the people in the famine districts have the money with which to buy it, why not send them the money instead of food? That is all there is to it.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. When the Senator from New York read those statements of Gov. Goodrich, I went out into the anteroom and asked Gov. Goodrich about them. I wish he could be on the floor and explain them, but, of course, he can not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There may be some explanation for it.

Mr. KENYON. You can not take one or two statements out of an article, and form your judgment on those statements; you must take the whole article. Following down on page 26 of the same letter, I ask the Senator to note this language:

While all this is true and while the ridiculous so-called human-interest stories sent out by sensational newspaper correspondents grossly exaggerate the situation, yet going into the situation as carefully as I could in the limited time at my disposal, I am certain that the situation is such that if immediate relief is not given, with the assurance of continued aid until July 1, hundreds of thousands of people, men, women, and children, will perish in the famine district who otherwise might live.

The governor tells me that there was food in Russia, not in the famine district but that it had been hoarded. If you had the money, you could buy it, provided transportation had not broken down; but he states that the transportation has broken down. They can not get it. If you have the money, you can buy food in Russia; 50,000 rubles, I think, for a luncheon; just as if a man were starving out in front of the Willard Hotel, if he had the money he could go in and pay $8 for a dinner and get the food. These people are in this dictrict where they can not get it. If we wanted to appropriate enough money to enable them to buy, that could be done.

Mr. SMOOT. I doubt very much whether it could be done——

Mr. KENYON. It could not be transported.

Mr. SMOOT. Because of the fact that they can not get transportation, for the transportation system, according to the testimony, has broken down completely, and no matter how much money they had, while those children are starving to death, it is impossible to get food.

Mr. McKELLAR. How could they get it all the way over there from the United States, then?

Mr. KENYON. Because it can be transported by water.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator mean to say that they can transport the food more easily from the United States than it can be transported in Russia?

Mr. SMOOT. There is water transportation, and it is much easier.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; it can be transported easier from the United States than from one place to another in Russia. That is the statement of Gov. Goodrich. His statements may seem at first blush to be somewhat contradictory, but, of course, you can take parts of a statement like that, just as you can pick up particles of evidence in a lawsuit, and prove anything; but you have to take the whole story. This man has been there; he has been the governor of a great State, he has had able assistants, who have not been there for the purpose of making money, and they are telling us of the situation. Some people seem to think, as some Senators do, that it is funny, and they laugh at it, and try to pick flaws in the arguments. Those people are starving, or Gov. Goodrich, Mr. Hoover, and all the others who have told us about the conditions there are liars.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I merely desire to say, then, that Gov. Goodrich has not as good an opinion of the Russian people as I have.

Mr. SMOOT. It does seem strange that a pound of butter would be worth only 25 cents; but do Senators realize what 25 cents means there? Do they know that in order to buy any kind of a breakfast almost anywhere in Russia it takes about 50,000 rubles? A cent of American money will buy about all the paper money in Russia you could pack.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have already consumed more time on this bill, probably, than I should have done, but I want to offer an amendment. I have reduced the amount from a million dollars to $500,000 and lodged the authority with the Treasury Department instead of with Col. Forbes. I ask that it be read.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as I can do so, I accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Arizona proposes to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to provide additional hospital and out-patient dispensary facilities for persons who served in the World War and are patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau, by construction on sites now owned by the Government or on sites to be acquired by purchase, condemnation, gift, or otherwise, such hospitals and out-patient dispensary facilities to include the necessary buildings and auxiliary structures, mechanical equipment, and accessories, and also to provide accommodations for officers, nurses, and attending personnel, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept gifts or donations for any of the purposes named therein. The location and nature of such hospitals, whether for the treatment of tuberculous, neuropsychiatric, or general medical and surgical cases, shall be in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

That for carrying into effect this provision relating to additional hospital facilities there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $500,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

A bill for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, that it request a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. OVERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

REVENUES OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, Senate bill 205, relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia, has been returned to the Senate by the House at the request of the Senate, and I would like to have it disposed of. I think there will be no debate.

I will state what I desire to have done. I shall ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was read the third time and passed, and then ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] was agreed to, in order that I may propose an amendment inserting the word "tangible" before the word "personal" and the word "property" after the word "personal," so that it will read "tangible personal property," making the amendment provide what everybody thought it did provide and what it was intended to provide.

I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the vote by which this bill was read the third time and passed be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside, and the Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 205) relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia.

The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the Senate reconsider the votes by which the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was called from the Chamber and I did not hear the request of the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The purpose is to have reconsidered the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] was agreed to, so as to insert the word "tangible" before the word "personal" and the word "property" after the word "personal."

I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas was agreed to be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In section 3 of the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas, before the word "personal," insert the word "tangible," and after the word "personal" insert the word "property," so that it will read:

Until otherwise provided by law the rate of taxation in the District of Columbia on tangible personal property and real estate shall be $1.75 per hundred.

And so forth.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I move to amend that amendment by inserting after the word "tangible" the words "and intangible," so as to include not only tangible property but also credits. There is no use of limiting the tax to real estate and tangible property. Credits ought to be included as well. Instead of "intangible" it might read "tangible property and credits."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I shall have to make a point of order against the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota. It is an amendment in the third degree.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I merely wish to say before the bill is passed that I think it is a mistake. I think it will be found that it is a temporary, makeshift arrangement which will not be satisfactory, but I am not disposed to raise any serious objection to it since the friends of the measure and the committee believe it should be adopted. However, I think it is a mistake.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MARINE INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I had hoped to bring up Calendar No. 239, the bill (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, but as the unfinished business is still before the Senate and one or two Senators desire to speak upon it, I shall not undertake to bring it up to-day. However, I give notice that after the routine morning business to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of that measure.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the hour is quite late, and I had hoped that we would proceed with the unfinished business earlier, and I expected to go somewhat into detail in giving the reasons which prompt me to favor the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. Now I feel that I must content myself with rather a brief presentation of some of the views I have upon the subject and offer some of the reasons which prompt me to favor that amendment, not as thoroughly, however, as I would otherwise desire to do.

There is no question that the farmers of the country are in a more or less distressed condition, worse in some regions than in others, and there are some very plain reasons why, at least to some extent, that condition exists. I favor the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina, but if that amendment is not agreed to in the Senate, I should prefer the bill as reported by the committee to no legislation at all on the subject.

Some of the reasons which have brought about the present very unsatisfactory condition in agriculture have to do with the financial affairs and operations of the farmers, and those are related, of course, to the Treasury Department of the Government. Some factors which have operated to discourage agriculture and to bear heavily upon the farmers of the country at present are such things as exorbitant and excessive freight rates. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] a few days ago made a very able speech in which he set forth very clearly and forcefully the way in which these excessive freight rates affect producers, particularly in the West. To a very great extent all he had to say upon the subject applies equally to producers in the South. Not only are these excessive freight rates operating so as to deprive producers of any profit upon the results of their labor and efforts but they are causing people to leave the farms and move to towns and cities and seek other occupations.

That, however, is not the only factor which is now operating seriously and adversely to affect agricultural interests. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency are members of the Federal Reserve Board. The Secretary of the Treasury is ex officio chairman of the Farm Loan Board. Some years ago, in order that the farmers of the country might be relieved of the burdens in the shape of interest which they had borne for years and the difficulty of obtaining long-term credit in order to supply their capital needs, Congress established a special system for the benefit of agriculture. The farm loan act was passed in July, 1916. As I said, the Secretary of the Treasury is ex officio chairman of the Farm Loan Board. That board is the official authority to carry into effect and execution the provisions of that act.

Under that system 12 district banks were created and established throughout the country. Each of the banks, known as the Federal land banks, was organized temporarily by the appointment of a board of directors by the Farm Loan Board. A considerable time was required to acquaint the farmers of the country with the provisions of the law and to induce them to resort to it for their capital needs and to avail themselves of the facilities which the law offered.

The farmer is a conservative citizen. He does not take very readily to new things. Very properly he demands that there shall be proved to him the merits of a proposition which is submitted to him before he will accept or agree to it. Considerable effort was made to acquaint the farmers of the country with the benefits to be derived through the operation of this law and to get them interested in the system. Finally, however, they began to see, largely from actual experience, the advantages it offered and to appreciate them and to avail themselves of the facilities afforded by that law.

By observation and experience they became impressed with the fact that under the system they were able to get accommodations at a rate of interest hitherto unheard of in this country, to wit, at 5½ per cent per annum, with the privilege of paying off the principal at the rate of 1 per cent per annum, with the right to pay off any part of the principal or all of it at any time after five years, and with other terms practically of their own choosing. The result has been that over $400,000,000 have been made available for the farmers of the country at 5½ per cent per annum on these favorable terms, and they are now more than ever anxious to take advantage of these facilities.

The law had been in operation only a comparatively short time—about three years—when suit was instituted by interests which had always opposed the legislation, by people who had been accustomed to make enormous earnings in the way of commissions upon loans and in negotiating loans upon farms at a higher rate of interest. They attacked the law as being unconstitutional. Suit was brought in the United States district court. The case was carried to the Supreme Court, and finally, last February, the Supreme Court sustained in every detail the constitutionality and validity of the law.

For nearly 15 months the system was paralyzed by reason of that litigation. Nothing was done of consequence except that the organization was kept together. No loans, however, were made. After the decision was handed down sustaining the constitutionality of the act the farmers of the country began to make applications for loans. Piles of applications had already accumulated, but they were discarded; it was ordered that new applications had to be filed. A new bond issue was ordered, and in May last an issue of $60,000,000 of bonds was put upon the market and they were readily taken up by the public. So this fund was available to loan to the farmers.

Recently another issue of bonds of $40,000,000 has been put out by the Farm Loan Board, for the $60,000,000 was wholly inadequate to meet the demands then made. The system is workable; it is sound; it is of unquestioned, demonstrated, and enormous benefit to the agricultural interests of the country.

However, what is happening under it? The Farm Loan Board says they can not find money for making loans beyond $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 per annum for two reasons: First, a physical inability to handle the business; that they lack the physical capacity under the organization to handle more than $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 in loans per annum; second, because they very much question if the public will absorb a greater amount than from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 of these bonds per annum.

Mr. President, the Farm Loan Board ought to be arranging to loan to the farmers of this country at this time $1,000,000 every day of the year. The loan of $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 to all the farmers of the country is wholly inadequate and insufficient; the board ought to loan three times that amount; and I contend that the reasons the board offers for not extending the operation of the system and meeting the calls and urgent demands of the farmers all over the land are unsound. If, for instance, the board needs a larger force in each of the land banks of the country, there being 12 of them, let them employ more experts, more abstracters, more lawyers to examine and pass upon papers, and more clerks to transact the business.

Under the law they have a margin of one-half of 1 per cent on all loans to cover the expenses of administering the system. That is far more than they need. A margin of one-fourth of 1 per cent would afford an adequate sum for all the force that they can require in order to transact the business. Let them increase their forces in all the banks where needed; let them increase their office force here or elsewhere as may be necessary in order to accommodate the needs of the agricultural interests.

In the second place, their assumption that the public will not absorb more than from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 per year of farm loan bonds is, in my judgment, without foundation. I need only refer Senators to the letter of Farm Loan Commissioner Lobdell to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] of October 15, 1921, which has been printed in the RECORD, in order to show that fact. He says:

> Leaving out, then, the question of direct loans from the Treasury, the question arises as to the rapidity with which the investing public will absorb farm loan bonds. That question has never been fairly tested out, because until the present time we have never been permitted to make two successive sales in a single year—the Treasury heretofore preferring to take the bonds rather than have us make repeated offerings.

Mr. President, who has any authority or right to deny permission to the Farm Loan Board to make as many offerings of farm loan bonds each year as may be needed? Judge Lobdell says:

> Until the present time we have never been permitted—

By whom? Not by the President, for he had nothing to do with it. By the Secretary of the Treasury? Undoubtedly he must be the authority, for he is chairman of the board; or by the Treasury Department—I will put it in that way in order not to make it personal. Where does the Treasury Department get the authority to deny to the Farm Loan Board the right to order the issuance of these bonds as they may be needed? There is no such authority. Congress never intended that the question when farm loan bonds should be offered to the public and in what amounts should be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury or by the Treasury Department. The Federal land bank, when funds are needed, must make application to the Farm Loan Board for its approval of such issue, and upon such approval, under sections 18 and 19 of the farm loan act, the bonds are issued.

The duty of the Federal land banks, on approval of the Farm Loan Board, is to issue as many bonds as will be necessary to meet the needs of the farmers of this country, when they comply with the law as to furnishing security, showing themselves eligible for the loans, and in all other respects complying with the provisions of the act; yet the Treasury Department has assumed, according to the statement of Judge Lobdell, to direct when these bonds shall be issued and when they shall not be issued.

So I argue it will be a very excellent thing if some farmer, some one whom Gov. Cox would probably call a "dirt" farmer, a farmer experienced in actual farming operations, and engaged in that industry, shall be connected directly with the Treasury Department, with both the Federal Reserve Board, the Farm Loan Board, and the boards of directors of the Federal land banks, also.

I am perfectly willing, Mr. President, that men experienced in financial affairs and in business, experts, if you please, in commercial matters, may hold these positions, provided they do not discriminate against and neglect the interests of agriculture; provided they do not demonstrate on every occasion that they have a special slant toward commerce and industry, business, and trade, rather than toward agriculture. They seem to forget agriculture.

Mr. President, as we know, the farmers must obtain their loans from the proceeds of bonds which are offered to the public. Unless the bonds are offered, there can be no sale, and unless there is a sale of bonds there are no proceeds, and the loans can not be made. The Treasury Department determined that they did not want these bonds put on the market. Why? The Treasury Department is not interested in agriculture apparently; they are more concerned about business and commercial affairs, and the Treasury Department did not want these bonds to come into competition with Liberty bonds and Victory bonds and Treasury certificates. They wanted the whole market for their securities, and the farmers' securities may be laid aside and wait. That is the attitude. Consequently the bonds were not offered, consequently there were no sales, and consequently there were no funds to loan to the farmers.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, who is the authority to determine when and how these bonds shall be issued?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Farm Loan Board. The Federal land bank reports through the registrar up to the Farm Loan Board: "We have so many applications for loans. We have passed upon and approved so many of these applications. We recommend the issue of bonds to a certain amount and ask your approval." Here are men out yonder in the country, toiling day and night, owning their farms, cultivating them, producing the food for the people of this country. They want some capital accommodation. They offer their property as security on the basis of 50 per cent of the value of that property as determined by your appraiser, not theirs. The Farm Loan Board name the appraisers in every district. Their appraisers pass upon the value of the property offered as security. They can not loan beyond 50 per cent of that value. These applications have been approved. They amount to so much—say, $500,000. The Federal land bank says, "We apply to you, the Farm Loan Board, to authorize us to issue bonds against these collective mortgages of $500,000." It is for the Farm Loan Board to authorize that issue; otherwise no bonds can be put upon the market, as I have said, no sales made, and no funds raised with which to make the loans that are applied for by these farmers.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, who constitute the Farm Loan Board now? I am acquainted with one or two of the members. How many members have they?

Mr. FLETCHER. There are five members. The Secretary of the Treasury is ex officio chairman, and there are four other members appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. SMITH. The Secretary of the Treasury constitutes one of the five?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Judging from the letter that the Senator read, it seems as though he has assumed the authority to say when and how these bonds shall be issued, if any at all. Is the Senator advised as to whether he has done this with or without the consent of his Farm Loan Board?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have read what Judge Lobdell said in his letter to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. He says:

> That question has never been fairly tested out—

That is, the question as to how many bonds the public will absorb per annum—

> Because, until the present time, we have never been permitted to make two successive sales in a single year.

How permitted, and by whom? I can only infer that it must have been done by the Treasury Department.

Mr. SMITH. Is not Judge Lobdell a member of the board?

Mr. FLETCHER. He is. He is the farm loan commissioner.

Mr. SMITH. And the law clothes the board with authority?

Mr. FLETCHER. He gives the reason:

The Treasury heretofore preferring to take the bonds rather than have us make repeated offerings.

I will get to that. It is proper to explain and relate certain circumstances at this point. The Senator will remember that in January, 1918, the Congress passed an amendment to the farm loan act; and this was done, mind you, at the insistence of the Farm Loan Board, because in their report they say this:

A year's experience of the numerous and complicated problems arising in the management and operation of these banks makes us doubt the wisdom of intrusting their control to borrowing members whose familiarity with the system has been limited to a few months' study or observation from the outside. It is doubtful if the direct management and control of any bank which is dependent upon borrowed capital for its control and operation can be safely delegated to the borrowers from such bank.

An amendment to the act, providing for a lengthened period of governmental control, has therefore been prepared and is respectfully submitted for the consideration of the Congress.

Now, what was done? The amendment to the act was passed authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to buy $200,000,000 of the bonds of farm loan banks, and that amendment provides that so long as the bonds of any bank shall be held by the Treasury the temporary organization of such bank shall continue in power. What does that mean?

Every director of every bank is selected and named by the Farm Loan Board. That was the temporary organization; but in the farm loan act Congress specifically provided that whenever the stock to the amount of $100,000 was paid up in any of these banks, that moment the stockholders themselves would have the right to select six of the directors, and the Farm Loan Board would have the right to name three of the directors of that bank. That was done for a distinct purpose, with the idea of promoting cooperation among the farmers, with the idea of connecting them up directly with the system which was instituted for their special benefit, created in their interest, and designed to serve agriculture throughout the country. Every time a man borrows money he must pay 5 per cent of the amount of his loan for stock in the farm loan association of which he is a member, and the farm loan association must subscribe to 5 per cent of the stock of the Federal land bank in that district, so that by that system the farmers themselves become stockholders in the Federal land banks; and whenever that stock amounted to $100,000 in any of these banks that moment the farmers themselves would have the right to select six of the directors in those banks, always retaining three to be selected by the Farm Loan Board, giving them that authority at any and all times and as to every bank.

When this amendment was passed by Congress, in January, 1918, eight of these banks had more than $100,000 each of their capital stock owned by the farmers who had borrowed money through those banks. Congress passed this amendment at the instance of the Farm Loan Board, saying: "The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to purchase $200,000,000 of these farm loan bonds."

The fact was the Treasury did not want those bonds put on the market, and the farmers of the country had a right to be up in arms because here was a system instituted for their benefit which would cease to function, cease to provide any money, although they offered the security and complied with the law, because the Treasury would not let the bonds go upon the market.

When that situation became acute something had to be done. The Treasury had to devise a substitute for a sale of these bonds. Then they said we will have to take some of these bonds and pay for them out of the Treasury funds, but when we do that we must provide in the law that so long as the Government owns any of these bonds the Farm Loan Board shall name every director in every district bank—that is, the temporary organization of each and every district Federal land bank shall continue in effect. These bonds run for 20 years. That gives the Farm Loan Board absolute control over all the affairs of every land bank throughout the land for the next 20 years.

Mr. President, some people talk about agricultural blocs. We hear, now and then, some criticism of those gentlemen who seek to confer together for the purpose of cooperating and bringing about some definite, constructive action which shall mean that the agricultural interests of this country shall not be sacrificed. Is there not need for something of that kind? Here are 139,000 stockholders in the district land banks in this country—men who have subscribed for that stock and paid for it, and who have a double liability resting upon them, the same liability that the stockholder in a national bank has, and yet not one of them has a voice in the selection of a single director to take part in conducting the affairs of those banks.

That is the situation—not a farmer on the Farm Loan Board; not a farmer on the board of directors of a single Federal land bank, chosen by farmers. Think of it. The farmer has no voice in the choosing of the directors of the banks which he himself owns. Did you ever hear of such a situation as that? Is it not time that some people came here and put their heads together, representing the people of this country, and made an honest effort to see that the farmers of this country shall not be neglected and discriminated against in this humiliating and shameful way? Call it "agricultural bloc" if you like; I would rather be a member of an agricultural bloc than of an aggregation of blockheads. The farmers of this country are not going to stand for that sort of treatment. They do not know what is going on until it is pointed out to them, but when they do know it you may look for something to happen.

As far as I am concerned, I feel like taking full responsibility for any share I may have in seeing that this fundamental industry of the country, upon which all prosperity must rest—because if the farmers are not prosperous nobody else can be in this land—has just and fair treatment in the legislative and in the executive branches of this Government.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will allow me, I must confess my ignorance as to the passage of the amendment to which he calls attention—that is, the one providing that so long as the Treasury Department holds these bonds against the several land banks the Treasury shall name the directors. It seems to me that the purpose of that amendment is too apparent—that thereafter, they naming the directors, they will, of course, control the whole workings of the system from the Treasury Department.

Mr. FLETCHER. Absolutely.

Mr. SMITH. Why is it not competent for us, this matter having been brought to the attention of the Senate, to have that part of the law repealed?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is, and I think it should be done, and done promptly.

Mr. KENYON. Is it not too late to do much practical good? They have the whole thing sewed up for 20 years.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course I think Congress can repeal the act that ties it up for 20 years. I think we can repeal that act at once, and I will say that a bill has been introduced to do that. It is, I think, before the Committee on Banking and Currency. It was introduced by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. KENYON. It will probably be there for 20 years.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is resting there very quietly, and the committee is not likely to act unless strongly urged.

I am simply saying this, Mr. President, by way of showing that the farmers of this country are not receiving proper consideration. They are in position to offer absolute security for every dollar that is furnished them under this system. As evidence of that, let me read you further from what Judge Lobdell says as to the safety of this security, because, first, if there is any limitation on the physical ability of these people to handle this business that can be removed by increasing their force. If it is claimed that there is a limitation of the other kind—namely, that the public will not take more than one hundred and fifty to two hundred million dollars of their bonds per annum—I deny that there has been any proof of that, because Judge Lobdell himself says that has not yet been fairly tested out.

The last issue of these bonds are to-day quoted at $103. I believe the public will take $360,000,000 of these bonds every year. But in order to meet that objection I have proposed an amendment to this act making short-term paper with farm-loan bonds to the amount of the face of the paper as collateral attached eligible for rediscount in the Federal reserve banks. That would create an almost unlimited demand for these bonds, and there is no question but what the banks generally themselves would want the bonds, if we would make short-term paper with them attached eligible for rediscount in the Federal reserve banks.

But the Farm Loan Board is not helping us in that effort and the Federal Reserve Board is opposing it. They say that means inflation. In one breath they say it means inflation and in the next breath they say the banks will not take the bonds, that it will not broaden the market for these bonds, and, therefore, there is no use to pass this legislation. One argument they offer answers the other.

So that every point the Farm Loan Board makes with regard to the reasons why they do not furnish more money, and more speedily, to the farmers of this country in response to their applications is utterly inconclusive. At least, there is not a question but what every one of them can be overcome.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I will state for the information of the Senator and of the Senate that the branch bank at Columbia, S. C., is supposed to furnish money in Georgia, and I have yet to learn of a single loan being made in the State of Georgia. On the contrary, the applications are turned down and treated with contempt, and the claim that they have not sufficient clerical force is in part disproved by the fact that the replies to these applicants for loans take up two or three typewritten pages, and the loan could have been passed on, or put in process of being passed on, while the man was dictating the letter.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I can produce letters from all over this country showing that farmers have made applications to form associations and for loans and they get no satisfaction; that they are discouraged against organizing the farm-loan associations, because evidently it is feared that the applications will come in greater number than the board wants. The farmers are notified by direction of the officers who act under the Farm Loan Board that there are numerous restrictions which they are imposing. One condition lately imposed is that a farmer who cultivates his farm by the tenant system—that is, requires a certain part of the crop to go to pay the rent—is not eligible to accommodation, although he owns the land, and is responsible for its cultivation, and actually directs it.

Another condition is that the district bank sends out notices to advise the farmers that it may be six or eight months before they will hear from their applications, and they do not know whether they will get any money then or not. All efforts are being made, reasonable and unreasonable, to limit the call on the Federal land banks by the farmers of this country for the loans which they so urgently need, which they never needed so badly as now. The effect is to limit the operation of the system, whereas Congress intended that it should not only be operated with diligence and with real energy and with encouragement to the farmers of the country to utilize it, but that it should be extended as required to meet their needs.

It is estimated that there are at least $4,000,000,000 loaned already on farms in this country; in other words, the farmers owe $4,000,000,000, secured by mortgages upon their farms. One of the purposes of this act is to enable them to pay off existing liens.

It will take 30 years, at the rate they are now operating this system, to take care of even the existing mortgages on the farms of this country, to say nothing of supplying any funds for development and constructive purposes and for acquiring homes.

That is the situation, and, as I was proceeding to mention, there is no question about the safety of these loans. As evidence that the security is good and can not be better, let me read you from this letter further:

> In practically three years of active operation the 12 Federal land banks, which, because they are mutually underwritten, may be treated as a unit, have been built up from $9,000,000 of capital and no assets until on September 30 they had—
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Capital of | $26,441,852.50 |
> | Reserve of | 1,514,500.00 |
> | Undivided profits | 2,460,766.52 |
> | Total assets | 419,224,766.08 |

The Federal land banks have up to this time made loans to the amount of $415,173,159.81, and in addition to these the joint-stock banks, provided for in the farm loan act, have loaned about a hundred million dollars to farmers. The letter of October 15 last continues:

> It has made loans to the amount of $413,506,190, and has collected interest and amortization payments to the amount of $53,067,882.27, and has to date taken just one bad debt loan in the sum of $200.

That shows whether these securities are good or not, whether these loans are safe or not. After all the operations, from the beginning to October 15, 1921, the only bad debt amounts to $200.

I say, Mr. President, that to my mind there can be no excuse, no sort of justification, on the part of those having in charge the administration of this act for not going on and arranging to furnish farmers the money, which they are able to make secure, and which they are entitled to receive under this act.

I am mentioning these subjects to lead up to this conclusion, that the farmers of this country have no voice whatever, directly, in the institution created to meet their needs and for their special benefit; are not even allowed to vote for any director in any of the banks which are operating under this system, although they own the stock in those banks; are not allowed any direct contact with the board itself; are not allowed any direct contact with the Federal Reserve Board; and the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal Farm Loan Board are all under the dominating influence of the Treasury.

For one, seeing how the agricultural interests of this country are not being properly regarded and fairly treated, seeing how the farmers themselves are being ignored and imposed upon by the administration of these systems at present, I can see no other way to remedy the situation just now but to endeavor to provide by law that farmers shall be directly connected with these agencies of the Government. I would instantly repeal the law which deprives them of the right to select six directors of each of these district land banks. It is all right to have the Government name the other three, but farmer borrowers are the stockholders, and they ought to name six of these directors, just as the act originally provided. I have introduced a bill, which is before the Committee on Banking and Currency, to make the Secretary of Agriculture a member of the Farm Loan Board; and I am perfectly willing to amend that so as to provide that the member shall be selected because he is a farmer and a man experienced in farming.

I want them directly connected; and, next to that, because that system was organized as much for the benefit of agriculture, I take it, as for any other interest, I would have him directly related as a member of the Federal Reserve Board. My observation, and the experience which the farmers of this country are going through to-day, convince me that that is the only way these interests will be properly looked after.

Now the farmer comes, hat in hand, before the Federal land bank and knocks, but is not admitted. He comes to the Farm Loan Board and knocks, but is not admitted. He comes to the Federal Reserve Board, and he is told to go home and attend to his business. They say to him: "Go home. Go to your fields. Go to work. Toil and sweat and fight the enemies of plant and animal life and the seasons, but you can not have any representation on any of these agencies which are created to administer these financial systems, one of them especially designed for the purpose of serving your needs."

He is told, "You are a farmer. You know nothing about business. You have no financial experience. You have no knowledge of economics. You are a dirt grubber, a clod knocker. All you need is muscle and a mule." That is what the farmers are told, in effect, by these different agencies of the Government. So far as I am concerned, the agricultural bloc may be denounced to the limit by politicians, by partisans, by office holders, and by others, as inimical to party government, as ruinous to party control, as unsound and unwise; but I am going to stand by any sort of cooperative effort which will fairly and justly protect these 30,000,000 people who live nearest the fountain of life in the divine economy; these people who produce the Nation's food, and without whose toil and struggle the world would have to go hungry and unclothed.

I take the responsibility for any legitimate effort to protect them, because under present conditions, my friends, the farmer is being sidetracked, he is being hoodwinked, he is being imposed upon and humiliated, he is being neglected and discriminated against. He has been now and then fooled and deceived by such assertions as that spending $20,000,000 for grain for Russia is going to help the price of his corn and his wheat, and by such pretense as the passage of the emergency tariff bill, alleged to have been for his benefit, when he knows that every article he produces has gone down in price since that bill was passed. That is the sort of thing that is furnished to the farmer by his alleged friends.

Why, Mr. President, somebody has to stand by this interest; somebody has to have the courage to speak out. I do not like to antagonize the officers who are administering the affairs of the Government, the executive officers and others, but it looks like we have come to a time when, unless we are harsh, unless we are ugly, unless we speak out frankly, we get no attention and accomplish nothing by being nice, conciliatory, and trustful. If it is necessary to be insistent and sultry, it will have to come to that.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. Does not the Senator realize that if anyone tries to do anything in Congress for the farmer, he is a demagogue and is simply looking for votes? That is the generally accepted notion—that if he tries to do anything he is trying to fool the farmer.

Mr. FLETCHER. That, of course, is one of the penalties attaching to those who speak for the farmer, as I have attempted to speak to-day. We will be accused of being demagogues and throwing out a line for the farmers' favor or advocating class legislation and drawing class distinction, and all that sort of thing. But I can not help it.

Agriculture is the greatest industry in the country. It is the industry upon which every other industry must ultimately depend. It lies at the base and foundation of all strength and wealth and power and prosperity. If it goes down, the whole structure goes. I am going to begin at the foundation and stand for that industry, as I have tried to do in the past.

There is a wide gulf between a form of government such as ours was designed to be and an aristocracy or a plutocracy. It is proposed by these critics that the leader or leaders of the party in power shall have control, which shall not even be shared.

That means government by a select few.

Equal opportunity and a share in control would be denied.

Liberty, a synonym for opportunity, would be destroyed.

Institutions which we cherish and which set every man free to be his best and do his best would be demolished. The foundations of the Republic would be undermined.

The glories of a free, representative democracy would disappear.

If those who are his sincere friends are not vigilant and aggressive, the farmer will not receive that practical, helpful consideration to which he is entitled here.

This criticism of the agriculture bloc proceeds, not so much from the desire for effective party government as it does from ambition to control in a way that means personal government.

When society is organized so that opportunity is not equalized, although shared, and control is lodged with a privileged class, you have an aristocracy, not a democracy.

If that class happens to be a capitalist class, you have a plutocracy.

Mr. President, if Senators are concerned about how these Federal land banks are organized, I would refer them to the Federal loan act, section 4, which shows how each land bank was organized, to begin with, by the naming of five temporary directors. Then, in 1918, we enacted a law that continued that temporary organization until the last minute when the Treasury of the United States shall hold any of these bonds. They now have $183,000,000 of them. They are going to hold some of them for 20 years. The bonds do not mature until 20 years from now, and that organization will be continued so that the farmers who have taken stock and are liable to the extent of double the par value of their stock have not a single vote on the board of directors or in the control or management of the institution.

There is a provision in the law that after the acquisition of stock authorized in the bill shall have reached the sum of $100,000 the officers and directors of the land banks shall be chosen as thereinafter provided; that is, by six of them being elected by the stockholders, the farm loan associations, and three appointed by the Farm Loan Board. Now, they have no voice anywhere. The farmer is not heard. He ought to be heard in thundering tones all along the line, from his farm loan association to his Federal land bank, through the Federal land bank to the Farm Loan Board and on to the Federal Reserve Board. I am in favor of putting him on directly by law, because that is the only way we will ever get him there.

Mr. President, there were some other matters which I desired to discuss, but the hour is growing so late that I shall not attempt it now. I leave the subject at this point.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I listened with great interest yesterday and to-day to the discussion of the bill which proposes to place a farmer on the Federal Reserve Board. I am heartily in favor of the measure. I favor it not only because I know it will be helpful to the agricultural interests of the country but because it would be for the best interests of the whole country. I think if we had had on the board a big, broad, fair-minded farmer, a man who had an intimate knowledge of conditions as they actually existed in the West, the farmers and stockmen of the Middle West would not have been compelled to dump their grain and live stock on the market a year ago at the most critical time and compelled to take ruinous prices.

The farmers of the country, and more especially the agricultural organizations of the country, are deeply interested in this measure and anxious to see it passed. In resolutions adopted only a couple of weeks ago by the annual convention of the National Farmers' Union, held at Topeka, an organization which has a membership of almost a million, I find this declaration:

> We demand an equitable pro rata representation of agriculture on the governing boards of the Federal reserve banking system as a means of converting a great necessary agency that has become a banker's bank into a financial institution to serve all the interests of all the people.

Among other interesting declarations in this report from this important convention held in my home city I find this:

> We desire to express our appreciation of the interest shown by those Members of the House and Senate who have formed an agricultural bloc in Congress for the many things they have thus been able to do for the farmers of the United States, especially the revival of the War Finance Board.

Mr. President, doubtless it has been observed that eastern newspapers and eastern business men are viewing the so-called agricultural bloc in the Senate and House with some disfavor. Frequently the "bloc" is referred to by them as a "menace to good government," as "setting the interests of the few against the welfare of the many," as "demanding special privileges in legislation for the class it represents," and so forth.

Also, it may have been noted, Mr. President, the letter from Mr. Otto Kahn, Wall Street banker, summoning "business men" to rally round the American business men's committee and save the country from the machinations of the farm bloc. In it Mr. Kahn disclaims any intent to form a business bloc where, I assume, it has long been popularly supposed that business sat on the right hand of government.

Bache's Review, published by a Wall Street banking house, prints a long blast against the "bloc" because this group of men gave their support to the Republican majority which enacted the tax bill.

Mr. President, I doubt if one can imagine how strangely all this reads to many people in the West who have long ago accepted the idea that big business and finance is an established, highly powerful, highly efficient political factor at Washington.

However, the critic who has astonished the country with his criticism is the chief of the War Department, Mr. Secretary Weeks, in his recent speech to New York business men. In a general attack upon a Congress whose achievements are considered somewhat epochal, not only did the Secretary of War find nothing good to say of any of the constructive measures enacted at the extra session in behalf of the farming industry and approved by signature of the President, but he condemned much of it as unsound economically, one must infer, because it was introduced by the so-called farm bloc.

It may be said, and I think it should be said, that the country, as a whole, as well as the President, the Secretary of Agriculture, and many other persons fully competent to pass on such matters and speak with authority, hold quite the contrary opinion to that of Mr. Weeks. Many of them have said that the best thing the last Congress did was to pass these desperately needed measures.

Some of this adverse comment against the bloc might be considered not without its tinge of humor were it not so beside the point, within the shadow of a very real national calamity—the collapse of this country's most vital industry, a collapse from which an unusually well-informed Secretary of Agriculture says it will take at least five years to rally. Agriculture is sick, and when agriculture is sick business invariably will be found ailing.

In the shadow of such a national calamity, are differing opinions in regard to the merits of a tax bill which probably will be superseded within the coming year so vastly important?

At least in the case of the larger issue, Mr. President, it would seem that East and West are vitally and equally concerned; that here at least we have interests in common, and stand, or should stand, on common ground.

The Nation should rejoice that at this time it has a President so wide awake to the needs of agriculture as is President Harding. His recent message to Congress was an impressive statement of the requirements and an indorsement of the farm bloc's relief program.

Mr. President, I think it can be shown that the so-called farm bloc is not attempting bulldozing methods to obtain legislation, but rather that it is doing its manful best to get needed things done, and as speedily and as well done as possible.

Speaking as one of this group interested, I can say that it has no desire to hold up Congress, nor anybody else; that its program is, first of all, directed toward bettering the general welfare; that it has worked in the open and has not attempted to interfere in any way with other programs. In the circumstances, then, it should not be so very difficult to convince eastern business men that the so-called bloc really is rendering the country a greater service at this time than any other group of men.

Business has lost billions by permitting speculators to prey on American farmers. It is losing other billions to-day because it will not demand that farmers be given a square deal. Would it not be better to have the "bloc" than to have everything blocked? The most frequent criticism of Congress that we hear is about its inaction or failure to get things done. As I understand it, what the people want is results from Congress. It is this compelling need of getting results that has brought the so-called agricultural bloc together and has inspired all its activities.

I feel certain if these critics knew the actual conditions in rural America as the members of this group know them, and if they were in touch with what these men are trying to do, all opposition to its efforts would cease. Notwithstanding what these critics may say, the agricultural group has never asked for class legislation. It has never attempted to dictate to the majority. We who are of it have simply united our efforts for measures that we knew were for the good of the country as a whole.

When an $80,000,000,000 industry capable of supplying the Nation annually with $22,000,000,000 of new wealth and 50 per cent of its bank deposits is well-nigh prostrate, it would seem that rescue parties might better be hailed with joy than viewed with alarm; also that whatever will promote the primary industry of food production might well be thought as of the common good rather than as class legislation and a menace.

Statistics running back half a century show that business failures generally vary in number in inverse ratio with the money value of crops per acre in the preceding year. When crop values are high, business failures the following year are few, and vice versa. This year, following an equally disastrous year in 1920, farmers are getting from 80 to 90 cents in their local market for wheat which cost them $1.37 to produce, and from 20 to 25 cents for corn which cost them 60 cents a bushel to grow. The live-stock farmer is a still heavier loser.

Within the last five years in one Kansas county hogs have decreased from 33,000 to little more than 15,000, while the corn acreage is 70 per cent less than six years ago. I have these figures from the county farm agent of the State.

The president of the Oklahoma State Board of Agriculture says Oklahoma has 48,000 farms without a steer on them, and that Oklahoma has 800,000 fewer stock cattle than in 1909.

Stocks of cured beef on October 1 were the lowest ever reported to the Bureau of Markets, being 4,000,000 pounds less than a year ago; 17,000,000 pounds less than the five-year average. These are Government figures. It looks as if very shortly beefsteak will, indeed, be beefsteak.

But what I fear most, Mr. President, is that as a Nation we are regarding the present condition of agriculture merely as a passing effect of the World War, not as the culmination of long-standing conditions adverse to the economic health of this industry which the war has only intensified and hastened.

One of the most successful and respected farmers in the United States, J. R. Howard, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, has declared that one and a half millions of the six million farmers of the country would to-day be insolvent if compelled to meet their obligations.

A farmer who has really farmed writes me:

> Every colt, hog, and steer I raise costs me more than I get for it; most of my wheat cost me more than I was paid for it; the taxes on some of my land are more than I can get off the land.

Mr. President, this decline of our agricultural industry has been going on in every agricultural State, and yet this Nation to-day would be flat on its back if it were not for agriculture and this year's crops. Sold at a loss, as these crops have been, when marketable at all under the excessive freight rates, they have been the cause of an enormous amount of newly created wealth changing hands. What money the farmer gets flows to the cities for his supplies, and so the Nation's business is kept alive. How much better business can be, or will be, depends on agriculture and the opportunities it has to prosper and make progress.

Here, Mr. President, is the true reason why we have a group of men in Congress sometimes called the "farm bloc." Our entire business structure rests upon the land. The farmer not only feeds us and clothes us, but is as a class our best customer. Without him the railroads would languish, the steel industry perish. Unless the farmer and the farm industry prosper, no other industry can. This is the task these Representatives and Senators from the agricultural States feel they have cut out for them. They will welcome help and support from any direction. This is a manifest duty they owe to the entire country, not merely to their constituency, for no one is going to escape the consequences of this collapse of agriculture. It now is only a question of ending it as soon as possible and, if possible, for all time. I know that this is possible, just as I know that it is imperative if we are again to know the meaning of good times.

The measures supported by the "agricultural bloc" are not proposals to give the farmer something for nothing, nor are they class legislation. They are the remedies urged by economists and students of agriculture, and, above all, by the farmers themselves to uplift this fundamental industry to a place where it will be a blessing to the country because it is self-sustaining and prosperous.

Mr. President, I would not have you believe that the agricultural situation is hopeless. I see many indications of improvement, and the helpful legislation passed at the special session of the Sixty-seventh Congress undoubtedly has aided in bringing about the change for the better. The revival of the War Finance Corporation has helped wonderfully to put the farmer in a more confident and optimistic frame of mind. President Harding's sympathetic attitude toward agriculture has been another encouraging factor. The producers of the West have undoubtedly reached the lowest ebb of their economic status and there is an evident tendency toward an upward trend.

But the farmer is still in need of the Government's best attention. He must have relief from the unequal price level which has been the source of his greatest discouragement. He must have still further reduction in freight rates, for agriculture as well as commerce and industry has felt keenly the paralyzing effect of excessive transportation charges. Then, too, we must give the farmer more flexible personal credit accommodations and a banking system adequate to rural needs.

Mr. President, nobody can impartially study the history of agriculture and conclude that it has not been sorely neglected. It has "just growed." For a century and a half nearly everything we have done, every system we have contrived in marketing, transportation, and banking, has been built to fit the development, happiness, and profit of city life. A Department of Agriculture and a few agricultural colleges have been considered adequate to meet our obligations to agriculture. And so they would if all that agriculture needed was advice; but it needs to grow and prosper in organized efficiency like the rest of the modern, highly organized world.

For more than a generation the American farmer has been awake to his isolated situation and has been struggling to mend it. When the after-war collapse occurred, it was the farmer who was without the organization and machinery to protect himself, and saw his products made the football of speculation and gambling.

Mr. President, farming is the only business left that buys at retail and sells at wholesale; that pays what is asked when it buys and accepts what is offered when it sells. The farmer remains merely a producer of the necessaries of human life. After he has produced them other organizations take them over at their own price for distribution. This is true of no other important industry. The producer gets but one-third of every dollar paid by the consumer for the products of the farm. Our expensive and antiquated marketing system takes the other two-thirds.

The commercial marketing and distributing agencies, well supplied with credit and closely linked with a highly organized industrial system, do not, like the farmer, dump their products after they have passed into their hands in a heap upon a congested market. With their facilities for nicely adjusting supply to demand, the middlemen, by means of the warehouse, the elevator, and cold-storage plant, and the grain and cotton exchanges, feed out the world's food supplies as demand calls for them. During the entire year they obtain what the products are fairly worth. The farmer gets only a third as much, and sometimes less.

Farming being too hazardous a business to be longer maintained at the mercy of glutted markets during every crop season and of organized buyers, in self-preservation the farmers of the United States are turning to self-organization, to dispose of their products; and to the control of elevators and of warehouses to market their own products and be represented on exchanges.

In his recent message to Congress, President Harding gave his unqualified approval to cooperative marketing legislation. Convinced that farm cooperation is desirable, a former Congress, by an amendment of the Federal trade act, undertook to release farm cooperative societies from any suspicion of attempted monopoly by exempting combinations "not for profit" from the scope of the antitrust act, which are intended to control wholly different forms of organization. Because this amendment proved ineffective, the Volstead-Capper bill, now being pressed by the agricultural group, authorizes and validates farm cooperation.

Mr. President, in farmer cooperation the amount of stock to any one stockholder is limited, the cooperative project is limited, and the stock dividends are limited to a fixed rate having no relation to the earnings, as in a corporation, but having regard to the ruling rate of interest for money or capital. It is by these limitations that the farm-marketing enterprise is protected against control by a few, and the vital cooperative spirit maintained. In farmer cooperation capital and labor are one. The dividends are rated on the product contributed, not on the capital invested.

We have discovered that middlemen organizations to prevent the rise of farm cooperative marketing are attacking local cooperative organizations of farmers in the courts for violation of the antitrust acts. The cooperative movement has long been obstructed and discouraged by these interests.

Danger of an agricultural monopoly through cooperation is not seriously urged, except for political purposes by special interests. Europe has proved that under farmer-cooperative enterprises an agricultural trust is impracticable and is contrary to all cooperative experience. Farm cooperation has not been successful in Europe nor in the United States, where the members are widely scattered, or where they are engaged in producing different products. Least of all is the American farmer likely to lose his individualism. Unless modern agriculture is to be taken over bodily by big business and great trusts, what it needs and must have to survive is farmer cooperation. There is not an economist nor an authority on agriculture who believes the methods of the corporation will do for agriculture. Every farm is a unit, and these widely separated units producing a variety of products can not be welded into a corporate aggregation.

While the American farmer leads the world in production per man, this Nation stands alone in the world in its inhibitions against farm marketing cooperation. In asking for the removal of legal obstructions to farm cooperation and to placing of the American farmer on the same footing as his competitor in every other country on the globe, the "agricultural bloc" is not asking special class legislation. The American farmer can never be an efficient salesman of his own products without the clear legal right to market them collectively, as given him in the Volstead-Capper bill.

It is not a belief but a conviction from which I can not escape that the farmer must be put on an equal footing with the man who buys his products or he will invariably get the worst of it. In clearing the way for agricultural cooperation, the agricultural bloc is not seeking to give the farmer special advantages over others but to open the way for him to adopt a plan of industrial organization suited to the conditions of his industry, as corporation is suited to other industries.

Other measures to which the so-called "farm bloc" has given its sanction include the Capper-Tincher antigrain gambling bill, already enacted into law. That measure is not class legislation but to correct the abuses of the grain exchanges, correcting evils condemned by the exchanges themselves and many years ago prohibited in their own rulings.

The same thing may be said of the bills regulating cold storage and providing for control of the packing industry, the Capper-French truth in fabrics bill, which applies to fabrics provisions similar to those of the pure food act, the bill that places a representative of agriculture on the Federal Reserve Board, and the bills creating more liberal banking credit, particularly personal credit, on crops and farm machinery, and making such paper more easily discountable.

The credit measure is the only one susceptible to the accusation of class legislation, for the reason that it does attempt to enlarge the banking credit of agriculture. As commerce and business have had to have a form of banking credit adapted to their needs, so it is with the farmer. We probably have the finest commercial banking system in the world, with its 30-day, 60-day, and 90-day note, perfectly suited to the turnover in commercial business. The farmer's turnover is mainly once in 12 months, or in the case of stockmen from 1 to 3 years. Our commercial system of credit does not fit his needs.

The purpose of the credit bills advocated by the "agricultural bloc" is to create banking facilities for farmers which shall be adjusted to the times and seasons of their needs; not to give credit where credit is not warranted. It is a belated effort to meet a profound need of agriculture. Its intent is not to supply the farmer with a more generous line of credit than other industries, but to fill the wide gap that has existed between his industry and the credit that every other industry enjoys. These bills provide for ample security for every credit the farmer asks and take notice of the longer period of his business turnover both as to crops and as to live stock.

National welfare and the Nation's prosperity in business are dependent on what is produced from the soil—not 5 nor 10 years from now, but this year and next year and every year. Business should be aiding instead of fighting its best friend; should be aiding instead of opposing the efforts of "farm blocs" in Congress.

Mr. President, agriculture must obey the great law of the universe; it must adapt itself to modern conditions or cease to exist. I believe that for the next quarter century the outstanding policy of this Nation should be the carrying out of a great constructive program for the encouragement and upbuilding of its farm and live-stock industry. If the measures proposed for the relief of agriculture are enacted, they will lay a broad foundation on which may be erected the world's best and most enduring system of agriculture. That also would mean the upbuilding of what would be the world's most enduring and most widespread and genuine national prosperity.

It seems to me, the fact that our prosperity as a people so largely depends on American agriculture should lead us inescapably to the conclusion that national welfare can best be subserved by making farming a safe and fairly profitable industry in this country, and as progressively modern and efficient as is any other industry.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 2780. An act to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended; and

H. J. Res. 238. Joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 955 of the Revised Statutes by extending the jurisdiction of courts in cases of revivor."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 21, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 20, 1921.

REGISTER OF THE LAND OFFICE.

Henry H. Errett, of Clayton, N. Mex., to be register of the land office at Clayton, N. Mex., vice Paz Valverde, term expired.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 20, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou dost come to us in so many ways that are beyond our understanding. We make no challenge, but we accept them, and in all our work we would be true and unafraid. Thou art the Lord of all and the strength of our lives, infinitely gracious, unutterably near, and wonderfully divine. O do Thou ripen love and gratitude in us that we shall be worthier of all Thy bounties. Continue to inspire all nations with an invincible desire for peace. Cast down and consume the spirit that wrecks and destroys and lift the whole earth to the high plane of intelligence, law, and righteousness. Then indeed shall we see the beginning of the new heaven and the new earth. In the name of the world's Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ISSUANCE OF CHECKS AND DRAFTS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 1033, insist on the amendments of the House, and agree to the conference asked for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 1033. An act regulating the issuance of checks, drafts, and orders for the payment of money within the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, has the gentleman consulted with the minority member of the committee, and does he concur in the desirability of this motion?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. FOCHT, Mr. ZIHLMAN, and Mr. WOODS of Virginia.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Senate resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate resolution 196.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be, and hereby is, requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 205) entitled "An act relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Committee on the District of Columbia will be discharged from further consideration of the bill, and the request of the Senate granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 142 and consider it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. J. Res. 142. An act to extend the time within which the special committee on the readjustment of the pay of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service may make its report to Congress.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the special committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, appointed in accordance with the last proviso of section 13 of the act entitled "An act to increase the efficiency of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service," approved May 18, 1920, be, and it is hereby authorized to make the report required in said section not later than the first Monday in March, 1922, notwithstanding that the said act requires the report to be made on or before the first Monday in January, 1922.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Let me ask the gentleman is this a concurrent or a joint resolution?

Mr. McKENZIE. A joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was ordered to a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

PROMOTION OF TRADE WITH CHINA.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 4810, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill 4810, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 4810. To authorize the incorporation of companies to promote trade with China.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. VOLSTEAD, Mr. DYER, and Mr. SUMNERS of Texas.

REVIVOR OF SUITS AT LAW.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute in reference to the enrolling of a bill passed by the last Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, last session we passed an act amending one of the sections of the Revised Statutes with reference to the revivor of causes of action in cases on the death of one of the parties. The bill was amended by the Senate and the House concurred in the Senate amendment. In the enrollment of the bill, however, all of the language which the Senate amendment struck out was not omitted from the enrolled copy of the bill. The bill as signed by the President and which is now the law is, by reason of the inclusion of some language which the Senate struck out, contradictory in its terms. I ask to have this bill repassed in order that it may conform to what was done by both branches of Congress, but which was vitiated by the error in the enrollment. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following joint resolution, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 238) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 955 of the Revised Statutes by extending the jurisdiction of courts in cases of revivor."

Resolved, etc., That an act entitled "An act to amend section 955 of the Revised Statutes by extending the jurisdiction of courts in cases of revivor," approved November 23, 1921 (public No. 104), be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 955. When either of the parties, whether plaintiff or petitioner or defendant, in any suit in any court of the United States dies before final judgment, the executor or administrator of such deceased party may, in case the cause of action survives by law, prosecute or defend any such suit to final judgment. The defendant shall answer accordingly, and the court shall hear and determine the cause and render judgment for or against the executor or administrator, as the case may require. And if such executor or administrator, having been duly served with a scire facias from the office of the clerk of the court where the suit is depending 20 days beforehand, neglects or refuses to become party to the suit, the court may render judgment against the estate of the deceased party in the same manner as if the executor or administrator had voluntarily made himself a party. The executor or administrator who becomes a party as aforesaid shall, upon motion to the court, be entitled to a continuance of the suit until the next term of said court.

"The provisions of this section shall apply to suits in equity and in admiralty as well as to suits at law, and the jurisdiction of all courts of the United States shall extend to and over executors and administrators of any party, who dies before final judgment or decree, appointed under the laws of any State or Territory of the United States, and such courts shall have jurisdiction within two years from the date of the death of the party to the suit to issue its scire facias to executors and administrators appointed in any State or Territory of the United States which may be served in any judicial district by the marshal thereof: Provided, however, That no executor or administrator shall be made a party unless such service is made before final settlement and distribution of the estate of said deceased party to the suit.

"SEC. 2. That the provisions of section 955 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by this act shall apply to suits in which any party has deceased prior to the passage of this amendatory act as well as to suits in which any party may die hereafter."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand that the act in which the error was made was passed just before the recess in the last session of the Congress.

Mr. WALSH. It was approved on the day the recess was taken. It was one of the last acts which the President signed.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Can the gentleman state to us how it passed the House? Was it on the Unanimous Consent Calendar or did it pass on Calendar Wednesday? How did it come up for consideration?

Mr. WALSH. As I recall, it came up on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. There was quite a little discussion upon the matter. The gentleman from Oregon participated and I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] and one or two others. The bill passed as it was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. It went to the Senate and was amended by the Senate striking out some language which was included in the bill as it passed the House and by inserting a few words in lieu thereof. When it came back to the House the Senate amendment was concurred in.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And the enrolling clerk included in the enrollment some of the words that were in fact stricken out by the Senate?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; that is the only difference.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state just what the error was?

Mr. WALSH. In the first paragraph which the Clerk read is the present law. The second paragraph, which begins with "The provisions of the section shall apply to suits in equity and causes in admiralty as well as actions in law," is the amendatory section, and the language left in was the words "in which the action is pending," which referred to the courts of the United States or the Territory of the United States—suits at law in courts in which the action is pending. It makes the first part of that paragraph contradictory when compared with the latter part of the second paragraph.

Mr. WINGO. I do not quite catch that. The gentleman has given one phrase. Will he kindly give the phrase that was left in which contradicts it?

Mr. WALSH. The words left in, as I recall it, were "in which the action is pending." Then it goes on to say "and such courts shall have jurisdiction within two years from the date of the death of the party to the suit to issue its scire facias to executors and administrators appointed in any State or Territory of the United States," and so forth, whereas the first part refers to a court of any State or Territory in which the action is pending.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am wondering by what authority we could pass an act by which a court might render judgment against an executor.

Mr. WALSH. It does not render its judgment until the executor is really a party to the action by the service of this writ.

Mr. KING. Is it not universally understood that you can not render a judgment against an executor?

Mr. WALSH. You can not unless he is made a party.

Mr. KING. Even when he is made a party?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, no. A suit is brought against the estate and of course the executor is the representative of the estate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WALSH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was ordered to lie on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill H. R. 8441 relating to special delivery of mail matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

NORMAN E. IVES.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present the following privileged report from the Committee on Accounts, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 230.

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $700 to Norman E. Ives for extra and expert services to the Committee on Invalid Pensions from May 6, 1921, to the end of the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, as assistant clerk to said committee by detail from the Bureau of Pensions, pursuant to law.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

H. M. VANDERVORT.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I also present the following resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 231.

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the House $200 to H. M. Vandervort for extra and expert services to the Committee on Invalid Pensions from March 5, 1921, to May 5, 1921, as assistant clerk to said committee by detail from the Bureau of Pensions, pursuant to law.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Vandervort served for two months prior to the time he was appointed Assistant Pension Commissioner, and this is to cover that period on a pro rata basis.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

SUBSTITUTE TELEPHONE OPERATORS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer another privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 240.

Resolved, That there shall be paid, out of the contingent fund of the House, compensation at the rate of $3 per diem each for the services of two substitute telephone operators during the present session.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

MARY H. YORKS.

Mr. IRELAND. I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 239.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Mary H. Yorks, widow of B. C. Yorks, late employee in the House post office, a sum equal to six months' salary as employee in the House post office, and that the Clerk be further directed to pay, out of the contingent fund, the expenses of the last illness and funeral of said B. C. Yorks, such expenses not to exceed $250.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. HICKS. Is that the customary payment?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

L. D. ARNOLD AND LENORE HUGHES.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 243.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to L. D. Arnold the sum of $186.67, and to Lenore Hughes the sum of $120, being the amount received by them per month as clerks to the late Hon. HENRY D. FLOOD at the time of his death, December 8, 1921.

Mr. IRELAND. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ARTHUR LUCAS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 220.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, $80 to Arthur Lucas for special janitor services rendered during the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress.

Mr. IRELAND. I move the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL ROOMS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 247.

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations is hereby assigned as an additional room the room on the basement floor, House wing of the Capitol, now occupied by the chief bill clerk and assistants; that the journal clerk, tally clerk, chief bill clerk, and their respective assistants, and such other employees of the Clerk's office as may therein be accommodated are hereby assigned to the rooms occupied by the House Library on the gallery floor, House wing of the Capitol; that the contents of the House Library be removed to such available space in the House Office Building as may be selected by the House Office Building Commission; and that the Architect of the Capitol and the Clerk of the House, under the direction and with the approval of the Committee on Accounts, are hereby directed to make ready such rooms for occupancy for the several purposes indicated, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this offers the happiest solution we have been able to find after a rather extended consideration of the subject of the present congested condition of the Capitol as to rooms for committees and Members. This removes the present library under authority in the resolution to the House Office Building, where it will probably serve the convenience of Members to better advantage than where it is at present located. It contemplates the removal of the clerks to committees and employees specified therein, after some slight remodeling, to the space now occupied by the library; it gives the present room occupied on the main floor by those clerks to the Committee on Appropriations, and it is the only room available that will seat them and have sufficient space for the committee, as it has been enlarged. This question has been gone over very carefully, and it has been the endeavor not to disturb any more than was absolutely necessary the present assignment of committees in the Capitol. We can find less objection to do this than any other possible way to accommodate the Appropriations Committee in their work——

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. CARTER. Is the room which is to be given to the Committee on Appropriations the old room of the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. ASWELL. What is the approximate cost of the repairs?

Mr. IRELAND. That is rather difficult to determine. It might run in the neighborhood of $20,000 for the removal of the library. It is quite a large job, the preparation of that room, but there will be no other expense we can contemplate now. I regret that seems a necessity, but that is the only way to get out of the congestion we are in.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. RAYBURN. Does not the gentleman think he ought to bring in a resolution first in reference to where he is going to place this library? It is inconvenient, of course, where it is, to some extent, but it is much more convenient where it is than to stick it in some hole over in the House Office Building, where it will probably be more inaccessible to Members than where it now is. I do not know where in the House Office Building the gentleman is going to put this library.

Mr. IRELAND. I have not a very definite idea of it myself, but we have the assurance of the Architect of the Capitol and the Clerk of the House that available space, as convenient as possible for the Members, will be found, and I have the assurance, further, that it will be much more convenient than at present. But, of course, that will come under the House Office Building Committee.

Mr. RAYBURN. I doubt very much whether it will be more convenient to the Members.

Mr. IRELAND. That is a question, that is true.

Mr. RAYBURN. Certainly there ought to be some arrangement made as to where it is going to be placed before the resolution is passed.

Mr. IRELAND. There will be no delay in the matter. They will work it out as best they can, and I think we can safely rely on their judgment in the matter, but the Committee on Appropriations is in suffering need of available space, where they can meet as a committee altogether, and that is not provided for at present. There is no room available large enough for them to meet in at present.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. I will.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Under this resolution while the gentleman says it will cost approximately $20,000, they can under that resolution spend $100,000, can they not?

Mr. IRELAND. Not while the Committee on Accounts is as at present constituted.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. How are you going to accomplish it? We merely authorize them to spend money to do the things the gentleman suggests there, but it does not limit them in the amount.

Mr. IRELAND. For years the House has apparently and with good reason had a great deal of confidence in the Architect of the Capitol, and he does things about as economically as they possibly can be done. We must have some trust in each other, and I think we will continue that in the man most competent to handle the matter. He has never so far disappointed us in the least.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. He missed the restaurant by $25,000 in a $50,000 appropriation.

Mr. IRELAND. No; he did not miss it. If anyone missed it, I did. Difficulties unable to be foreseen were encountered.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. I am not speaking of the man's integrity, but ought there not to be some limitation to this expenditure as a matter of business?

Mr. IRELAND. I would deem it unnecessary under the present circumstances.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the Committee on Appropriations to retain its present quarters and have this additional room besides?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes. The Committee on Appropriations has been in need of additional rooms for subcommittees. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which could be removed to other quarters without action of the House, has been removed to the House Office Building and has been provided with adequate quarters there. The Committee on Appropriations has those two rooms for additional subcommittee rooms, in addition to what they already had, and I think this will suffice for the present.

Mr. BARKLEY. As to this library, it strikes me that the resources of the library are apt to be more useful to the Members of the House when the House is in session than during the morning hours when the Members are in their offices. If we remove the library over there, would it not be practically impossible to get books back and forth to the floor of the House on the spur of the moment?

Mr. IRELAND. Investigation and inquiry have shown that the House library is very little used nowadays by the Members. There are days when no one enters it at all, as I understand. It is thought that we can provide needed facilities in the little library off the floor of the House, where needed reference books and other volumes can be secured as quickly as they may be needed and called for.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Gladly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The most valuable sets of books in this library now are the records of the proceedings of Congress, including the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, running back to the beginning of the history of the Government. If they are removed to the House Office Building, they would not be available during the proceedings of the House, and the time when they are most valuable is during the discussions that take place in the House. I fear if we were to transfer those volumes to the House Office Building they will cease to be of any value whatever.

Mr. IRELAND. Do not the precedents and digest serve that purpose for immediate reference? Occasionally, when one has need to refer to them specifically he would have ample opportunity for preparation for that and can prepare for it in advance. I will say to the gentleman that we have canvassed this matter from every angle, and this is the best arrangement that we can figure out.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Did the committee consider any available space in the House Office Building for the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. IRELAND. The Committee on Appropriations has probably greater call to have its quarters adjacent and contiguous to the House than any other committee, and for that reason they are perhaps given a preference in the matter of their location.

Mr. BANKHEAD. You did not give any consideration to that aspect of the question except that they would have to be taken care of in the Capitol Building?

Mr. IRELAND. We proceeded on that assumption.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If it was not necessary to get the consent of the House to transfer the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, why was it necessary to get the consent of the House in the present instance?

Mr. IRELAND. On account of the removal of the library.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Assuming that Members do not use the House library to any great extent, what objection would there be to transferring it to the Congressional Library? Then we could send pages over there to get books.

Mr. IRELAND. That has been thought of, but it was thought it would be a little more convenient to locate it in the House Office Building. But personally I was of the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. IRELAND. Gladly.

Mr. MANN. Just what room on the floor below is it intended now by this resolution to give to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. IRELAND. The one formerly occupied by the Committee on Indian Affairs, across the corridor from the room that the gentleman from Illinois occupies.

Mr. MANN. The old Journal clerk's room, down below, which has no outside communication at all?

Mr. IRELAND. No; it has no outside light or ventilation.

Mr. MANN. Does this also include the room recently assigned to the Journal clerk?

Mr. IRELAND. No; it does not. They will be removed from there, such members of the force as are there at present.

Mr. MANN. Has it been indicated to my colleague that the Committee on Appropriations will be satisfied to occupy that large room down there?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes. That is the preference of the chairman. It has been my thought that the Committee on Appropriations, meeting as a whole not so very often, did not need the ventilation and light and healthful conditions, because they would not remain in session very long, whereas the bill clerks and the Journal clerks that are there all the time did need it.

Mr. MANN. Well, the Speaker some time ago very considerately and very properly assigned the room that Gen. Sherwood used to have, down below, to the Journal clerks and tally clerks, because that room was killing off the boys down there. Of course, I do not know what the Committee on Appropriations are going to do with it, but I have no doubt they will be able to take care of themselves. I am not worrying about that.

Mr. IRELAND. Very probably.

Mr. MANN. Now, has anybody any idea at all where the library is to go in the House Office Building?

Mr. IRELAND. Not definitely; no. But there is available space there that can be accommodated to the use of the library.

Mr. MANN. I agree with the gentleman that there is no use in maintaining this library upstairs where it is. If anybody wants to use it he has got to get the information himself, as a rule, because the employees in the main do not seem to have any use for it. We reserved at one time a room in the House Office Building for that library, the large room below the room of the Committee on Ways and Means. That is what it ought to have been used for. But it was decided otherwise by the House Office Commission and some committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Has the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which formerly had a room downstairs, been moved to the House Office Building?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. If that can be done without a resolution, why can not these changes be made without a resolution?

Mr. IRELAND. Because it was thought that you could not remove the library without the action of the House. The rooms are under the charge of the Speaker, but in our judgment the library could not be moved without the action of the House.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman said a moment ago that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads had been provided with quarters in the House Office Building.

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. In that regard I desire to say that a little over a year ago I was asked by the Clerk something about my quarters, and I said I would like to have three rooms.

I told him a year or two ago that the correspondence with the post-office officials all over the United States was so great that I had to have two or three clerks, and that when the committee was in session there was no place except the desk that I occupied where these clerks could work, and so I suggested that I should like to have another room. Then they said a while ago that they had quarters that were ample over in the House Office Building if I was willing to move. I sent my clerks over there, and they said they thought it was a large room and a nice room; but when I came to move in there I found that it was too small to divide into three rooms; there is not space enough for the table; so it was decided to move the partition that is now there and make the room occupied by the chairman smaller in order to give room for the committee. Instead of getting three rooms, I got two rooms. They are, however, nice, airy light rooms. If I had three rooms so that the clerks could work while the committee is in session, that would be what I expected.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the gentleman speaking in so low a tone of voice that nobody can hear what he says. He has been talking quite a while about some room over in the House Office Building, but nobody here has heard a word that he said.

Mr. STEENERSON. I can not hear what the gentleman from Texas says. I am simply calling attention to the fact that I can not let the remark go unchallenged that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IRELAND] has made, when he said that they have provided ample quarters for the Post Office Committee; because I understood I would have space for three rooms, and I find that the space is only sufficient for two.

Mr. IRELAND. The gentleman inspected his quarters, and I understood he was satisfied with them.

Mr. STEENERSON. It was all in one room.

Mr. IRELAND. The gentleman knew the size of it.

Mr. STEENERSON. I sent the boys over there to see it.

Mr. IRELAND. Did not the gentleman see it himself?

Mr. STEENERSON. I did not measure the table, and now I find the table would not fit if it was divided into three rooms.

Mr. IRELAND. Well, we will provide the gentleman with a tape measure. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASWELL. Has the gentleman's committee considered the proposition of turning over this Hall of the House to the Post Office Committee and finding some other place for the House to assemble? [Laughter.]

Mr. IRELAND. In good weather we might go out on the Plaza.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WINGO) there were—ayes 79, noes 39.

Mr. WINGO. I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point for the present.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it, and the resolution is agreed to.

HELEN M. NETHERWOOD.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I have one more resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois offers a resolution, that the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 251.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Helen M. Netherwood the sum of $186.67, and to Rowena Bond the sum of $120, being the amount received by them per month as clerks to the late Hon. John A. Elston at the time of his death.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 136. An act for the relief of Dr. O. H. Tittmann, former Superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey;

S. 1535. An act for the relief of the estate of Catherine Locke, deceased; and

S. 1856. An act to reimburse Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in Twenty-third Infantry, for loss of certain personal property.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,500 copies of the hearings before the Committee on Finance of the Senate on the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, revised and indexed, of which 2,000 copies shall be printed as separates, by schedules (including not to exceed three supplemental volumes), 1,000 copies for the use of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be held for compilation by volume, of which 500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate document room and 1,000 copies for the use of the House document room: Provided, That the compiled edition only shall be printed as a Senate document.

SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, the following Senate concurrent resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

Senate concurrent resolution 17.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,500 copies of the hearings before the Committee on Finance of the Senate on the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, revised and indexed, of which 2,000 copies shall be printed as separates, by schedules (including not to exceed three supplemental volumes), 1,000 copies for the use of the Committee on Finance of the Senate and 1,000 copies for the use of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be held for compilation by volume of which 500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate document room and 1,000 copies for the use of the House document room: Provided, That the compiled edition only shall be printed as a Senate document—to the Committee on Printing.

PRINTING OF SENATE TARIFF HEARINGS.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate concurrent resolution No. 17.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks to take from the Speaker's table a Senate concurrent resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,500 copies of the hearings before the Committee on Finance of the Senate on the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, revised and indexed, of which 2,000 copies shall be printed as separate volumes by schedules, including not to exceed three supplemental volumes, 1,000 copies for the use of the Committee on Finance of the Senate and 1,000 copies for the use of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be held for compilation by volume, of which 500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate document room and 1,000 copies for the use of the House document room: Provided, That the compiled edition shall only be printed as a Senate document.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, it seems to me that the number to be printed will be rather small for Members who will have requests for these hearings upon this important piece of legislation.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, the number does not seem large, but it was thought that we could get through with this number, and I have been advised that this is the minimum number that should be printed. The cost of the printing of these hearings will be considerable. I can not give you the figures, because this resolution was passed in the Senate to-day and messaged over here with the idea of having the House pass it promptly so that the hearings could be printed and be used by the members of the Finance Committee and the members of the Ways and Means Committee during the recess.

You will note that the resolution provides that 1,000 copies are to be printed for the use of the Ways and Means Committee and 1,000 copies for the Finance Committee of the Senate, 1,000 copies to be sent to the House document room and 500 copies to the Senate document room. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I do not think we ought to print an edition which there is no question will be insufficient. I think the Committee on Printing ought to give it further consideration. It only came over from the Senate to-day. I think rather than to have to come in again with another resolution for additional printing the Committee on Printing might well give it further consideration and see whether we can not get a larger number.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Would not it be quite practicable, if these hearings are printed in plate form, and if it is found that they are valuable for people outside of Congress, to order a reprint without any additional expense. Only a small number of these are to be bound—1,500 out of the 3,500.

Mr. KIESS. That is true, and it will be possible to order a reprint, as the plates will not be destroyed.

Mr. MANN. The plates will be there if there is a demand for a greater number.

Mr. KIESS. The purpose of the resolution was to get the 1,000 copies for the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Committee on Ways and Means of the House quickly.

Mr. MANN. I think the Ways and Means Committee ought to have them, but I want to expedite in any possible way that I can the action of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Nobody expects that the printing of these documents in this way is going to expedite any action at the point where the gentleman from Illinois expresses a wish for action. Mr. Speaker, at present, I object.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 1856. An act to reimburse Horace A. Choumard, chaplain in the Twenty-third Infantry, for loss of certain personal property; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 1535. An act for the relief of the estate of Catherine Locke, deceased; to the Committee on Claims.

S. 136. An act for the relief of Dr. O. H. Tittmann, former superintendent of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

WORLD'S DAIRY CONGRESS.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of H. J. Res. 233.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 233 providing for the postponement of the World's Dairy Congress.

Whereas the Secretary of State in his letter of November 22, 1921, to the President indicates the inability of the World's Dairy Congress Association to make necessary preparations for the holding of the World's Dairy Congress in the year 1922, as authorized by the act approved March 3, 1921, making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, and suggests that the said World's Dairy Congress be postponed until 1923; and

Whereas the President in his letter, dated November 23, 1921, to the Senate and House of Representatives, recommends the postponement of said World's Dairy Congress in accordance with the suggestions of the Secretary of State: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the World's Dairy Congress authorized by the act approved March 3, 1921, making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture be postponed from 1922 to 1923.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out the preamble and all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the authority granted by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, approved March 3, 1921, to the President to extend invitations to foreign Governments to be presented by delegates in a World's Dairy Congress to be held in the United States in 1922 is hereby modified so as to authorize the extending of such invitations for such congress to be held in 1923."

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, as an explanation of this resolution I will say that in the last agricultural appropriation bill of November 21, 1921, provision was made for a world's dairy congress. This was done at the request of the dairy associations all over the United States, and it was to be of no expense to the United States Government. They have found, on account of the reconstruction in different countries, that they can not prepare for the congress in 1922, and this is simply to extend the time until 1923.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WINGO. Reserving the right to object, where are they going to hold it?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. In Washington.

Mr. WINGO. It has no connection with the League of Nations? [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. No; it is nothing except a dairy congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out, page 2, line 10, the word "presented" and insert in lieu thereof the word "represented."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair yesterday referred to the Committee on Military Affairs a bill for the creation of an American memorial highway commission. The Chair thinks that he was mistaken, that it should go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and without objection the Chair will make that reference.

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that no quorum is present, and it is evident that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and thirty-four Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 119, noes 42.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 196, nays 11, answered "present" 9, not voting 216, as follows:

So further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The name of the Speaker was called, and he voted "aye."

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). Was the gentleman in the Hall and listening when his name was called?

Mr. ANTHONY. I was not, and I desire to vote "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will be recorded as present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No, Mr. Speaker; I do not think so at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On a motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call gentlemen may be recorded as present, but can not vote as "present."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The last call developed a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state on this question, which is to dispense with further proceedings under the call, a quorum is not necessary.

Mr. BURROUGHS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will be noted as "present."

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to answer "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can be recorded as present.

Mr. COLE of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman present and listening?

Mr. COLE of Ohio. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will be noted as being present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I am in the same state.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can be noted as being present.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, pending that I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division. Well, to save time, Mr. Speaker, I will ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee demands the yeas and nays; 43 gentlemen have arisen, a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

During the foregoing roll call—

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. Where are the 50 Democrats that were here just a moment ago?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I object to the gentleman interrupting the roll call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can not interrupt the roll call.

Mr. WINGO. Where are the 303 Republicans that you have got?

The Clerk resumed and completed the calling of the roll.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the yeas are 175, the nays 7, present 1, a total of 183, not a quorum. The Chair takes note of the fact that a quorum is not present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order that the Speaker has not the authority, under the rules of the House, of his own motion, under circumstances of this sort, to direct the closing of the doors and the calling of the roll, and to direct the Sergeant at Arms to issue his warrant until action of the House has directed it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, less than a quorum can direct the issuing of a warrant. My recollection is that the rule provides that 15 Members upon motion may order it. The point I am making is that the Speaker may not, of his own motion, direct the issuance of a warrant without an order from the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not said anything about issuing a warrant.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I make the point of order that the Speaker may not, under circumstances such as now exist, direct a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. Section 4 of the rule says:

> Whenever a quorum fails to vote on any question, and a quorum is not present and objection is made for that cause, unless the House shall adjourn there shall be a call of the House, and the Sergeant at Arms shall forthwith proceed to bring in absent Members—

And so forth. A quorum has failed to vote, and it is clear that a quorum is not present. It is the duty of the Chair on a roll call to take note of the fact that a quorum does not respond, and the Chair thinks he has the right immediately to order another roll call.

Of course this whole rule was adopted for the purpose of preventing obstruction. A glance at the Democratic side will show whether there is now an attempt at obstruction or not. It is clear that there is, as there are less than half a dozen Democrats present, and the Chair has the right, following the purpose of the rule, to take note of the fact that a quorum is not present and for that cause to order a call of the House, and that the doors shall be closed, and that the Sergeant at Arms shall bring in absent Members.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Another inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Is the Sergeant at Arms present?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows that the Sergeant at Arms is at present attending the funeral of a Member of the House, but the Chair does not suppose that that necessarily means that the office of the Sergeant at Arms here is vacant or defunct. The Chair thinks that the going away of one individual officer on the duty of the House does not necessarily mean that that whole office is ineffective.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I understand also, Mr. Speaker, that there is no sworn Deputy Sergeant at Arms now in the city.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there is.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think the House would have to proceed with the selection of a Sergeant at Arms. I do not think the office is defunct at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there is a sworn Deputy Sergeant at Arms here. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will bring in absent Members. As many as are in favor of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union will, as their names are called, vote "yea," those opposed "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll. [Applause.]

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 190, nays 23, answered "present" 4, not voting 215, as follows:

So the motion of Mr. VOLSTEAD was agreed to.

During the roll call the following occurred:

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I understand information is being telephoned——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order the gentleman from Tennessee can not interrupt the roll call.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This relates to the roll call. I understand that information is being telephoned that warrants have been issued. Now, I do not understand that any warrants have been issued, and I object to that information being telephoned unless it is a fact.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not ordered any information telephoned. The gentleman can prevent it if he wishes—if he can. [Laughter.]

The roll call was completed.

The result was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13) to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching.

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any criminal prosecution shall have been instituted or any warrant of arrest shall have been issued, or any arrest shall have been made, or attempted, with the purpose and intent of criminal prosecution, in any State court, against any person within the jurisdiction of the State, whether he be a citizen of the United States or not, and such person shall appeal, as hereinafter provided, for the protection of the Government of the United States upon the ground that he has reasonable cause to apprehend that he will be denied the equal protection of the laws by the State within whose jurisdiction he is, or by any officer or inhabitant of such State, such person shall be entitled to the protection of the courts and officers of the United States to the end that the protection guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States may be given.

SEC. 2. That any person within the jurisdiction of any State charged with a felony or other crime who shall file with the clerk of the district court of the United States within whose jurisdiction he is a duly verified petition showing (1) that he is charged with, or has been arrested for, the alleged commission of, or participation in, some felonious or criminal act, the nature of which shall be set out in his petition; (2) that he has reason to apprehend that, because of his race, nationality, or religion, which shall be specifically stated in his petition, the petitioner is likely to be denied the equal protection of the laws, either by the courts, the officers of the law, or other inhabitants of the State within whose jurisdiction he is; and (3) that some other person or persons of his race, color, nationality, or religion, within the jurisdiction of such State, charged with an offense similar to that with which the petitioner is charged, have been put to death without trial or brutally assaulted or otherwise maltreated, or have been denied trial by due course of law in the courts of such State upon similar charges, because of the race, color, nationality, or religion of such person or persons, he shall be entitled to and shall receive the protection of all officers of the United States. The duly verified petition above described may be verified and filed either by the person in jeopardy as above described or by another person in his behalf. Upon the filing of such petition with the clerk of such court it shall be the duty of such clerk to issue forthwith to the marshal a warrant commanding him to bring the body of such petitioner into court for hearing upon such petition.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the marshal upon receipt of such warrant to arrest and detain the petitioner and to protect him from assault or injury; and in case such petitioner is in the custody of any State or municipal officer, sheriff, marshal, constable, bailiff, jailer, warden, policemen, or other officer or person, upon a warrant to hold petitioner for prosecution in any State court for felony or other crime, such marshal shall take such petitioner from such State official, receipting to him for the body of the petitioner.

SEC. 4. That when said petitioner shall have been brought into court he shall be entitled to a summary hearing upon his petition, and, in case he has been taken from the custody of any State officer he shall, in event his petition is not sustained, be surrendered by the marshal to the State officer from whom he had been taken; and if he has not been taken from the custody of any State or municipal or other officer, he shall, in the event his petition is not sustained, be set at liberty, and the costs of the proceedings shall be taxed against him. In case the petition is sustained by the court, the petitioner shall be remanded to the custody of the marshal for protection until petitioner may be tried in the proper district court of the United States upon such indictment, information, or other charge as may have been or may be made or returned against him, and for the purpose of such trial such district court shall have and possess jurisdiction to try and determine any and all proceedings upon indictment or information which may be removed from any State court under this act.

SEC. 5. That the removal of criminal prosecutions provided in this act shall conform in all respects to removals in other cases provided for by sections 31 and 32 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

SEC. 6. That section 140 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 140. Whoever shall knowingly and willfully obstruct, resist, or oppose any officer of the United States, or other person duly authorized, in serving or attempting to serve or execute any mesne process or warrant or any rule or order, or any other legal or judicial writ or process of any court of the United States or United States commissioner, or shall assault, beat, or wound any officer or other person duly authorized, knowing or having reason to believe him to be such officer or other person duly authorized, or any person lawfully in the custody of such officer or other person so duly authorized in serving or executiny any such writ, rule, order, process, warrant, or other legal or judicial writ or process, shall be fined not more than $10,000 and imprisoned not more than 10 years."

SEC. 7. That section 141 of the act of 1901 last referred to is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 141. Whoever shall rescue, or attempt to rescue, take, or abduct from the custody of any officer or person lawfully assisting him any person arrested upon a warrant or other process issued under the provisions of any law of the United States, or shall, directly or indirectly, aid, abet, or assist any person so arrested to escape or to be taken or abducted from the custody of such officer or other person, or shall harbor or conceal any person for whose arrest a warrant or process has been so issued, so as to prevent his discovery and arrest, after notice or knowledge of the fact that a warrant or process has been issued for the apprehension of such person, shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both; and in case the taking or rescue of any such person in custody as aforesaid shall be followed by the killing of the person so taken from custody, all persons engaged in such taking or abduction or killing or in any way contributing thereto shall be guilty of murder and shall be punished as provided in section 275 of the act to which this act is amendatory. Any person charged with the murder of a person taken from the lawful custody of any officer of the United States or that of any other person duly authorized may be indicted for murder and tried in the district court of the United States for the district in which the offense charged was committed."

SEC. 8. That the putting to death within any State of any person within the jurisdiction of the State by a mob or riotous assemblage of three or more persons openly acting in concert, in violation of law and in default of protection of such person by such State or the officers thereof, shall be deemed a denial to such person by such State of the equal protection of the laws and a violation of the peace of the United States and an offense against the same.

SEC. 9. That every person participating in such mob or riotous assemblage by which such person is put to death, as described in the section immediately preceding, shall be guilty of murder and shall be liable to prosecution, and, upon conviction, to punishment therefor, according to law, in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction in the place where such putting to death occurs.

SEC. 10. That every county in which such unlawful putting to death occurs shall be subject to a forfeiture of $10,000, which may be recovered by action therefor in the name of the United States against such county for the use of the dependent family, if any, of the person so put to death; and if none, for the use of the United States, which action shall be brought and prosecuted by the attorney of the United States for the district in which such county is situated in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction therein. If such forfeiture is not paid upon recovery of judgment therefor, such court shall have jurisdiction to enforce payment thereof by extent of levy of execution upon any property of the county, or may compel the levy and collection of a tax therefor, or otherwise compel payment thereof by mandatory or other appropriate process; and every officer of such county and every other person who disobeys or fails to comply with any lawful order of the court in the premises shall be liable to punishment according to law as for contempt and to any other penalty provided by law therefor. For the purposes of this section and the one immediately following the District of Columbia shall be deemed a county, as shall also each of the parishes of Louisiana.

SEC. 11. That in the event any person so put to death who shall have been taken from a State or municipal officer in one county by a mob, or riotous assemblage of three or more persons, shall have been taken in one county and transported to another before such killing shall have taken place, each and every county through which such murdered person shall have been transported during the time intervening between his capture by such mob or riotous assemblage shall be jointly and severally liable to the forfeiture hereinabove provided; and in the event such person shall have been taken from one State to another between his taking and killing, the forfeiture above provided shall be enforced in both State jurisdictions by separate and distinct actions in the several Federal jurisdictions.

SEC. 12. That every State or municipal officer having the duty or power of preservation or conservation of the peace at the time and place of any such putting to death as described in section 8 hereof, who, having reasonable cause to believe that the same is being or is to be attempted, neglects or omits to make all reasonable efforts to prevent the same, and every State or municipal officer having the duty or power of prosecuting criminal offenses at such time and place, who neglects or omits to make all reasonable effort to prosecute to judgment under the laws of such State all persons participating in such mob or assemblage as hereinabove described, except such, if any, as have been or are held to answer therefor in a district court of the United States as hereinabove provided, shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the United States and shall be liable to prosecution therefor in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction in such place, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 13. That every State or municipal officer having the custody within a State of any person charged with or held to answer for any crime or offense, who suffers such person to be taken from his custody by a mob or riotous assemblage of three or more persons openly acting in concert, in violation of law, with the purpose of putting such person to death or inflicting bodily violence upon him in default of protection of such person by such State or the officers thereof, shall be deemed guilty of an offense against the United States and shall be liable to prosecution therefor in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction in the place where the same occurs, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 14. That in any prosecution for any of the offenses defined herein, and in any action for the forfeiture imposed as herein provided, every person who has participated in lynching or in the putting to death of or of the infliction of great bodily violence upon any person without authority of law, and every person who entertains or has expressed any opinion in favor of lynching or in justification or excuse thereof, or whose character, conduct, or opinions have been or are such as, in the judgment of the court, may tend to disqualify him for the impartial and unprejudicial trial of the cause, shall be disqualified to serve as a juror; and the attorney of the United States in such action or prosecution shall be entitled to make full inquiry thereof and to produce evidence thereon; and every person who refuses to answer any inquiry touching his qualifications on the ground that he may thereby criminate himself shall be disqualified as aforesaid.

SEC. 15. That any act committed in any State or Territory of the United States in violation of the rights of a citizen or subject of a foreign country secured to such citizen or subject by treaty between the United States and such foreign country, which act constitutes a crime under the laws of such State or Territory, shall constitute a like crime against the peace and dignity of the United States, punishable in like manner as in the courts of said State or Territory, and within the period limited by the laws of such State or Territory, and may be prosecuted in the courts of the United States, and, upon conviction, the sentence executed in like manner as sentences upon convictions for crimes under the laws of the United States.

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the phrase 'mob or riotous assemblage,' when used in this act, shall mean an assemblage composed of five or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority of law as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.

"SEC. 2. That if any State or governmental subdivision thereof fails, neglects, or refuses to provide and maintain protection to the life of any person within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage, such State shall by reason of such failure, neglect, or refusal be deemed to have denied to such person the equal protection of the laws of the State, and to the end that such protection as is guaranteed to the citizens of the United States by its Constitution may be secured it is provided:

"SEC. 3. That any State or municipal officer charged with the duty or who possesses the power or authority as such officer to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by any mob or riotous assemblage, or who has any such person in his charge as a prisoner, who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to prevent such person from being so put to death, or any State or municipal officer charged with the duty of apprehending or prosecuting any person participating in such mob or riotous assemblage who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to perform his duty in apprehending or prosecuting to final judgment under the laws of such State all persons so participating except such, if any, as are or have been held to answer for such participation in any district court of the United States, as herein provided, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding five years or by a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"Any person who participates in a mob or riotous assemblage that takes from the custody or possession of any State or municipal officer any person held by such officer to answer for some actual or supposed public offense and puts such person to death as a punishment for such offense, or any person who participates in any mob or riotous assemblage that obstructs or prevents any State or municipal officer in discharging his duty to apprehend, prosecute, protect, or punish any person suspected of or charged with any public offense and puts such person to death as a punishment for such offense, shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be imprisoned for life or for not less than five years.

"SEC. 4. That any person who participates in any mob or riotous assemblage by which a person is put to death shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be imprisoned for life or for not less than five years.

"SEC. 5. That any county in which a person is put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall forfeit $10,000, which sum may be recovered by an action therefor in the name of the United States against such county for the use of the family, if any, of the person so put to death; if he had no family, then to his dependent parents, if any; otherwise for the use of the United States. Such action should be brought and prosecuted by the district attorney of the United States of the district in which such county is situated in any court of the United States having jurisdiction therein. If such forfeiture is not paid upon recovery of a judgment therefor, such court shall have jurisdiction to enforce payment thereof by levy of execution upon any property of the county, or may compel the levy and collection of a tax therefor, or may otherwise compel payment thereof by mandamus or other appropriate process; and any officer of such county or other person who disobeys or fails to comply with any lawful order of the court in the premises shall be liable to punishment as for contempt and to any other penalty provided by law therefor.

"SEC. 6. That in the event that any person so put to death shall have been transported by such mob or riotous assemblage from one county to another county during the time intervening between his capture and putting to death, each county in or through which he was so transported shall be jointly and severally liable to pay the forfeiture herein provided.

"In construing and applying this act the District of Columbia shall be deemed a county, as shall also each of the parishes of the State of Louisiana.

"SEC. 7. That if any section or provision of this act shall be held by any court to be invalid, the balance of the act shall not for that reason be held invalid."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13, the antilynching bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2591) to provide for the construction of a public bridge across the Niagara River.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 21, 1921.

The Chaplain, Rev. J. J. Muir, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, we thank Thee for the privileges of living and the opportunities of service. Grant that our hearts may be always inspired by the example of Him who went about doing good. In these days may there be gladness in evidence, hope and cheer constantly presented, and may we be willing to serve Thee with the largest consecration and devotion. We ask in Christ Jesus' name. Amen.

ATLEE POMERENE, a Senator from the State of Ohio, appeared in his seat to-day.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MOVING-PICTURE INDUSTRY IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, in response to Senate resolution 121 of August 5, 1921, a report on the development of the moving-picture industry in foreign countries and the extent of the importation of films of foreign manufacture, which was ordered to lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 17) to print 3,500 copies of the hearings before the Committee on Finance of the Senate on the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, etc., the tariff bill.

The message also announced that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia, agreed to the conference requested by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. ROGERS, Mr. TEMPLE, and Mr. CONNALLY of Texas were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 233) providing for the postponement of the World's Dairy Congress, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

S. 2719. An act to reimburse certain persons for loss of private funds while they were patients at the United States Naval Hospital, Naval Operating Base, Hampton Roads, Va. (Rept. No. 373).

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 548) to place Albert Hamilton on the retired list of the United States Navy, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 374) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 2893) to authorize the exchange of certain lands within the Wasatch National Forest, Utah; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 2894) to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to try and adjudicate the claim of James Matthews, as receiver of the partnership of Thorpe & Bond, on a contract for construction work; to the Committee on Claims.

OFFICERS OF NAVAL AIR SERVICE.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read, printed, and lie over until to-morrow.

The resolution (S. Res. 200) was read, as follows:

Whereas extensive publicity has been given to examinations recently required of officers of the Naval Air Service holding temporary commissions and members of the Naval Reserve Flying Corps desiring to transfer to permanent ranks in the Navy;

Whereas it has been publicly charged that such examinations were unfair and unreasonable, that an insufficient opportunity for preparation was afforded, that the greater portion of such examinations was devoted to navigation, steam engineering, seamanship, and other subjects wholly unrelated to aviation, and that the individual ability of the officer or member was not given proper consideration;

Whereas it has been stated that as a result of such examinations many of the successful candidates were reduced in rank and a very large per cent of the candidates were declared unqualified for permanent commissions; and

Whereas unless some action is taken the United States will lose the services of approximately 200 trained and experienced aviators, including the most experienced and skilled pilots in the country: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate, by subcommittee or otherwise, is authorized and directed to investigate the transfer and the examinations held in connection with the transfer of such officers and members, under the provisions of section 3 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes," approved June 4, 1920, and to hold public hearings, during the recesses or sessions of the Sixty-seventh Congress, at such times and places as it may deem advisable, in order to determine the correctness of such charges and statements, to make recommendations to the Secretary of the Navy, and to report to the Senate the findings and recommendations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over under the rule.

APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICE IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on the 7th instant I offered a resolution based upon newspaper reports to the effect that a great number of persons were being taken from the United States to Porto Rico and inducted into office to the exclusion of Porto Ricans. I felt that it was a great injustice to the residents of Porto Rico if their beautiful island was to be filled with carpetbaggers drawn from continental America. Since the resolution was introduced I received a letter from President Harding, which I ask may now be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 19, 1921.

MY DEAR SENATOR KING: My attention has been called to a resolution which you presented to the Senate, which, if adopted, will call for the number of continental and native citizens in the employ of the insular government of Porto Rico.

Having learned of the matter, I felt so ready to have you have the information that I asked Gov. Reily to advise me concerning his appointments, so that I might give you the desired information without awaiting the sanction of the Senate by the passage of your resolutions.

Gov. Reily became the chief executive of the islands on last July 1, and at that time found 49 continentals and 5,911 natives employed in the insular government. The only changes of any consequence since that time have resulted in reducing the number of continentals from 49 to 45. You will probably be interested in having the details of these particular changes. My appointments to the island service are four in number: First, E. Mont. Reily, governor, succeeding Gov. Yager, a continental appointed by President Wilson; second, W. L. Kessinger, auditor, succeeding a continental appointed by President Wilson; third, J. B. Huyke, commissioner of education, a Porto Rican, succeeding Paul G. Miller, a continental appointed by President Wilson; fourth Robert H. Todd, commissioner of immigration, a Porto Rican, succeeding L. C. Evans, a continental appointed by President Wilson; fifth, M. R. Pesquera, prohibition director, a Porto Rican, succeeding Dr. Donaldson, a continental appointed by President Wilson; sixth, H. S. Besosa, United States agent for collector of internal revenue, a Porto Rican, succeeding George S. Matthews, a continental appointed by President Wilson.

You will note, therefore, that in the major appointments there have been six changes, and in four instances officeholders who were appointed from the continent have been succeeded by citizens of Porto Rico, Other than Gov. Reily, only one appointee comes from Kansas City, Mo., namely, the auditor, Mr. Kessinger.

Since Gov. Reily has been in executive authority he has made 25 appointments to the island government, and of this number 2 are former continentals who have resided in the island for a quarter of a century, who are representative citizens, and both of whom formerly held the positions to which Gov. Reily appointed them. One of these appointees was first named by President Taft and the other by President Wilson. All others are native Porto Ricans.

Gov. Reily informs me that there are 174 continental American teachers employed in the schools of Porto Rico, this number including those connected with the insular university. These governmental employees from the continent are not included in the list of employees above quoted. I understand that the commissioner of education is seeking now to secure 200 more continental American teachers. There seems to be a very general demand for this service in order to promote the instruction of Porto Rican children in the English language.

This information, I have assumed, is what you are seeking by your resolution, and I am more than happy to transmit it for the information of the Senate without awaiting the passage of the resolution.

If there is any other information desired concerning the administration of the government in Porto Rico, it will be a pleasure to make it available at any time.

Very sincerely,

WARREN G. HARDING.

HON. WILLIAM H. KING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was gratified to receive this letter from the President. It will prove reassuring and silence criticisms which have been leveled directly against Gov. Reily and indirectly against the administration. The letter would seem to indicate that it was the purpose of the President to select, so far as possible, bona fide residents of Porto Rico for official positions within that Territory.

The conduct of both political parties in dealing with Territories has long been the cause of serious criticism and has provoked resentments upon the part of those living within such Territories. The policy of political parties for many years has been to send to Territories, whether insular or continental—to hold positions of trust and responsibility, as well as subordinate and inferior positions—persons who resided beyond the borders of such possessions and Territories. Carpetbaggers—those who had no interest whatever within the Territories, who were not acquainted with the people, and who were ignorant of their needs, aspirations, and surroundings—have been forced upon the inhabitants of our Territories, and they were, of course, compelled to accept their ministrations. Too often discredited politicians—those who were obnoxious to party leaders within some of the States—have been commissioned to control and exercise authority within the Territories of the United States. The result has been that the people of the Territories were restive and discontented under the form of government imposed by the United States, and demanded with vehemence that they be admitted into the Union in order that they might enjoy the benefits of Statehood and be permitted to select their own governors and representatives and officials.

It is highly important that in dealing with our insular possessions the wishes of the people residing therein should, so far as possible, be respected. The people of Porto Rico came to the United States as the result of war. They spoke a different language, possessed different traditions, and in many ways their culture and civil and political institutions were at variance with our own. The Federal Government, in dealing with Porto Rico, should manifest the greatest consideration and, indeed, sympathy for the people of that Territory. Due regard should be had for their past history and every legitimate effort made to bring them into accord with the political institutions and with the spirit and genius of our Government. They should be treated with respect and courtesy and with consideration. They should be made to feel that they are not political exiles or beyond the pale of constitutional government. I believe the people of Porto Rico will respond in a most generous and hearty manner to every step taken to promote their prosperity and welfare and to bring them within the same influence and spirit that controls and binds the States and people of this Republic.

I know that the people of continental United States are profoundly interested in the welfare and happiness and freedom of the inhabitants of Porto Rico, who now wear the proud title of "Americans." As I interpret the President's letter, the bona fide residents of Porto Rico will be accorded full consideration in the matter of political appointments. The President, I feel sure, knowing his broad sympathies and his liberal and enlightened views, will strive to promote the welfare and happiness of the people of this beautiful island who now with us rejoice in the liberty that the Constitution of this Republic guarantees to all.

CLAIMS REFERRED TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. CALDER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution No. 170, which refers to the Court of Claims certain bills introduced by me in connection with claims against the Government for damages sustained during the war. I doubt if it will take a moment's discussion. If it does, I shall not ask for its consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the bills making an appropriation to pay the R. S. Howard Co., of New York City, N. Y., its loss and damage incurred and suffered by it in complying with United States Navy commandeer order No. N-3255, dated June 18, 1918 (S. 1529); the Acme Die Casting Corporation, of New York City, N. Y. (S. 1534); the Sirio Match Co., of New York City, N. Y. (S. 1527); Fairbanks, Morse & Co., of New York City, N. Y. (S. 1533); the Thermal Syndicate (Ltd.), of New York City, N. Y. (S. 1526); the Drapery Hardware Co., of New York City, N. Y. (S. 1525); Charles B. Chrystal (S. 1532); the William Wrigley, jr., Co. (Inc.), of New York City, N. Y. (S. 1524); and the P. L. Andrews Corporation (S. 1521), now pending in the Senate, together with all accompanying papers, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Court of Claims in pursuance of the provisions of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911; and the said court shall proceed with the same in accordance with the provisions of such act and report to the Senate in accordance therewith.

Mr. FLETCHER. Has this matter been considered by the Committee on Claims?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; it has.

Mr. FLETCHER. And the committee favors this action?

Mr. CALDER. Yes. The resolution simply refers to the Court of Claims, for a finding of facts, certain bills introduced by me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

WORLD'S DAIRY CONGRESS.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the House joint resolution in regard to the invitation to be extended to foreign countries to send delegates to a dairy congress. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate yesterday reported a similar joint resolution, worded differently, but having exactly the same object in view.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House joint resolution.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not object, but the question of procedure, in my mind, is whether the rules would require the joint resolution to go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and then be reported back.

Mr. NORRIS. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry have had before them a similar joint resolution and have reported it, and it is on the calendar.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that. That would be the regular way; but I presume it can be done legally in this way, and I have no objection.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 233) providing for the postponement of the world's dairy congress was read the first time by its title and the second time at length and considered as in Committee of the Whole, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the authority granted by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, approved March 3, 1921, to the President to extend invitations to foreign Governments to be represented by delegates in a world's dairy congress to be held in the United States in 1922 is hereby modified so as to authorize the extending of such invitations for such congress to be held in 1923.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the similar joint resolution now on the calendar, reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, Senate joint resolution 146, authorizing the President to extend invitations to foreign Governments to send delegates to a world's dairy congress in 1923, will be taken from the calendar and indefinitely postponed.

CONDITION OF SUPREME COURT DOCKET.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 198), submitted yesterday by Mr. TRAMMELL, was read as follows:

Whereas all causes brought to the Supreme Court of the United States for final decision should be acted upon by said court without undue delay; and

Whereas if the docket of the said court is so congested that litigants are unable to obtain a prompt decision in the court of last resort the Congress should afford the relief necessary to correct such conditions; and

Whereas, the Senate desires information upon the question of whether or not there is such number of cases constantly pending in said court as to make it impossible for the court to dispose of cases without long delay and hardship upon litigants because of their inability to get prompt action in this the highest court in the land: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States is requested to direct the clerk of said court to furnish to the Senate such data and information as may be necessary to indicate the condition of the docket of the said court; to advise the number of cases on the docket awaiting final disposition by the court; to give the average length of time required for a decision after cases are ready for action by the court; and to furnish such further information as the Chief Justice may order the clerk to transmit to the Senate in response to this request regarding the status of the litigation in the said court.

Mr. FLETCHER. My colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is not in the Chamber at this moment.

Mr. KENYON. I suggest that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will go over without prejudice.

RELIEF OF DISTRESS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, on yesterday, without a roll call and very much to my surprise, the Senate passed a bill appropriating $20,000,000 for the purchase of grain for Russia. Already a storm of protest is beating upon the Capitol. Senators are receiving telegrams and letters. One of those letters I will, with the permission of the Senate, read. It does not come from my State; it comes from North Carolina, and is as follows:

DEAR SIR: I want to call your attention to the inclosed clipping with which you no doubt are familiar.

It is a clipping the head line of which reads as follows:

Bill providing $20,000,000 for starving Russians passed by the House by large majority.

I proceed with the letter:

This is hard for me to understand, as I am personally interested in trying to get a rating from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. I was gassed twice and also wounded once while a member of Company D, of One hundred and nineteenth Infantry, Thirtieth Division. I enlisted April 27, 1917, and was in all the major offensives that the Thirtieth Division took part in; and as a result of this gas I am not able to work and have no clothes or money. Don't you think I should receive consideration before these foreigners do? I want to protest against the passage of this bill by the Senate, for there is enough hunger and privation among the ex-soldiers of the United States. I feel sure that you will do all in your power to defeat this bill. If the United States Government has money to give to Russia in unlimited quantities, why should they not give me what I justly deserve? If you care to substantiate the above assertions, my complete military record is on file at the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

It is with deep regret that I call on the honorable Senators at such a busy time, but this matter demands immediate attention, and assistance that you will render me will be very much appreciated.

He evidently meant "any assistance you will render me."

Thanking you in advance, I beg to remain,

Very truly, yours,

THOMAS W. STEVENS,
Ward 12, U. S. P. H. No. 50, Oteen, N. C.

Then he gives his claim number.

Mr. President, many years ago the potato blight struck Ireland. Within a day or so the teeming population of that storm-tossed country were reduced to the brink of starvation. Public meetings were held all over the Union. One of them was held in the city of New Orleans, where Sargeant S. Prentiss made a speech which has become a classic—it may be found in all the books on oratory—in which he spoke of the Irish soldier who had successfully fought the battles of every nation except his own. At that time, when the millions of Ireland near to us, the island whose blood has mixed with ours from the very beginning of our national existence, whose soldiers fought in the Revolutionary War, whose soldiers fought in every war we have had since—even then there was no attempt to secure from Congress an appropriation like this. People were appealed to in just such meetings as that held in New Orleans, which was addressed by Prentiss.

Again, Mr. President, there have been famines in China, and harrowing stories would come to this country about them. Charitable contributions would pour in and private relief would be extended. No attempt was made upon the Treasury, upon the trust funds committed to our care.

There have been famines in India. Those famines lasted for months and months; and pictures, hideous to behold, were printed in the newspapers and magazines throughout the United States. Again, there were societies and individuals who took up collections for the relief of stricken India; but no effort was made to violate the Constitution, to take the people's money, to leave our own distressed people in distress and go through this Hooverizing process of relieving Russia.

Some years ago, Mr. President, there was a famine in Russia. What did we do about it? Charitable associations and sympathetic individuals bought vesselfuls of grain and sent it to the relief of the starving Russians. No attempt was made upon this trust fund committed to us by the people. We are placed by our oath of office in front of the Treasury door and we are sworn to protect that trust fund. I repeat, no effort was made in that case to invade the Treasury.

Yesterday I called attention to the fact that it is only in recent years, Mr. President, that Congress has granted domestic relief—relief to afflicted people in the United States. Only a few years ago, historically speaking, President Cleveland vetoed such a bill when offered in behalf of Texas—that vast area, an empire in itself, in whose history I glory and to whose interests I am deeply committed. A drought had struck that imperial State; the young cotton plants had been destroyed; there were no seed left with which to replant the fields. Congress passed an appropriation to buy seed, but President Cleveland vetoed the bill, thus killing it.

When I was a Member of the House of Representatives the Mississippi Valley was overflowed. Tens of thousands of people in the great valley of the Mississippi had their homes swept away; had their live stock swept away; had their means of support destroyed. In that great valley they stood, without a change of clothing, with no houses to shelter their heads, with no food, and no work possible for them. In that situation, "Private" John Allen, of Mississippi, introduced a bill for the relief of those people from that providential calamity. I was present when the leaders of the House went to him and urged him not to press it, and, because the Democratic leaders urged Mr. Allen not to press his bill, he did not press it, and the bill failed.

Mr. President, this bill can not pass the Senate before the holidays. Mr. Hoover will have to wait. Mr. Hoover is not an American, except barely, if at all, by the accident of birth. His entire life has been a foreign adventure; his entire sympathies are continental—European, not American. When he was nominated to the Cabinet President Harding put a millstone around his neck, and that millstone will drag President Harding down if such measures as this continue to be brought forward and passed.

The enormous vote which was given to the Republican ticket last year was not so much a Harding vote as it was an anti-Wilson anti-Hoover vote. If I wanted to see the Republican Party commit suicide I would support this measure as a matter of strategy; but above the interests of my party or yours, Senators on the other side, I place the interests of my people, and my people are those of the East and the North, the West and the South.

Knowing as I do of the suffering throughout the country, of the squalor that exists within a mile of where I stand, and of the squalor that exists in the capital city of my own State; knowing of the crowded tenement with its inevitable filth, disease, vice, suffering, and starvation, I would be recreant to my sense of duty if I did not assume the full responsibility of demanding a yea-and-nay vote on this bill. The headline says it passed the Senate by a large majority, but I do not think it will be finally passed by so large a majority.

Why should Mr. Hoover be organizing an international benevolent society? The newspapers yesterday said he was doing it. How much of this money will be left for the Russians by the time the Hoover agencies get through working on it, and salaries, expense accounts, and commissions are deducted? How much of this grain will ever get into the shape of a loaf of bread, and how many loaves will it carry to starving Russia? Are we forever to play the Don Quixote of the universe? Have we no regard for our own suffering poor? Where are the men who spoke and voted against the soldiers' bonus bill? Do they think that, with that vote and those speeches in their records, they can go before their people and defend their vote for this Russian relief?

Senators, if you put this $20,000,000 of Russian relief before the soldiers' bonus bill you will have a hard case to plead in your defense when your constituents justly blame you.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator will recall that a few months ago there was brought to the attention of Senators on the other side the fact that the Government had expended nearly $100,000,000 on the Muscle Shoals project on the Tennessee River, in Alabama, and we asked for $10,000,000 more to proceed with that work to completion, stating that if the $10,000,000 were not provided thousands of people would be thrown out of employment and the money already invested would be lost, but they denied us the $10,000,000.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is true, Mr. President. You single out the products of the West. Why so? Does anybody believe that western sentiment is going to be changed by this $20,000,000? How much of that grain remains in the hands of the men who grew it, in the hands of the men who reaped it, in the hands of the men who thrashed it? How much of that grain is in the hands of the original producer? Trust companies control flour. Trust companies control the available supply of wheat and corn. This is a donation to trust companies, not to individual farmers; and, as a Senator remarked here a few days ago, the farmer is not so stupid as he is sometimes considered. He reads for himself; he thinks for himself; he acts for himself. The most independent man on earth is the ordinary farmer. The time may have been when he could have been properly caricatured as a rustic with his long beard and his unkempt clothing. That time is past. The ordinary farmer knows more about questions of finance and of economics than the ordinary merchant or banker.

The Senator who addressed the Senate yesterday on the constitutional argument, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], virtually declared that Congress could do anything not forbidden by the Constitution. Just the reverse of that is the law, Mr. President. If he wanted to state, with considerable clearness and force, exactly what the Constitution is not and what the law is not, he achieved a brilliant triumph.

Another Senator, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], argued that because various Governments, including our own, had wronged the Russian government, we ought to extend this relief. He likened it to the case of a starving child at his door to whom he would give a loaf of bread. In the first place, we are not giving our own loaf of bread; we are giving somebody else's loaf of bread; and we are preventing the American child here at home, starving, from eating that loaf of bread.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Just in this connection, I thought at the time that the Senator from Idaho was scarcely just to the United States in his reference to what we had failed to do for Russia and the things that we had done which we ought not to have done, and he ought to be reminded of the fact that there appears on our books now due from Russia to the United States $192,601,297. Not only that, but the very day the President was delivering this message to the House the Senate passed a joint resolution giving to the Russian people now about $4,000,000 worth of hospital supplies from our Army surplus, so that we have been doing something.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. DIAL. I should also like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether he recalls the size of the army that Russia is maintaining at the present time? The number is something like a million and a half, according to the last statement I saw, as I remember.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it is well known, I think, that the present government of Russia has had large armies on at least three fronts.

Mr. DIAL. No; I mean what she is maintaining now.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I was coming to that. There was the army which drove the British out of Persia and out of the oil regions of Baku. There was the army which met the Poles, whom the French were financing, when they were attacking Russia. There was the army which met Gen. Wrangel, Gen. Denikin, and Admiral Kolchak. They have vast armies, Mr. President, much in excess of a million and a half of men. The general idea I get of the Russian situation is that they have not less than 4,000,000 men under arms.

The statement appeared yesterday in the remarks of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] that Russia, even in the famine field, has an ample supply of food; but the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] thought it was an ample reply to say that only those who had the money could buy it. If the Russians have the food and will not feed one another, why in the name of God and common sense should we do it? Nobody denies that they have the food. The Senator from Nebraska did not deny it. He said they did not have the money to buy it. He did not deny that the food was there.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. OVERMAN. The food of Russia, as was shown here yesterday, is flour. This bill does not pretend to send them any wheat; it is corn. They do not know how to grind corn; they do not know anything about corn, and I am told that they will not eat it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from North Carolina is very illuminating. It offers food for thought; but the statement remains undenied that Russia has the food. Well, if Russia has the corn, why come to America for it? The Jews did not go down into Egypt until famine struck Palestine. Then they went down into the Valley of the Nile, where Joseph had the corn. Russia has the corn, the wheat. Is she so unnatural as to allow her own children to die at her gate from starvation, when she herself has the corn? Let some Senator disprove the statement made here yesterday. Let some Senator challenge it. As yet, no challenge has been heard; no denial has been made. Then Russia has the corn; and if she can not provide for her own household, she is worse than an infidel.

Are we to understand that the richer class of Russians, the middle class, the well-to-do, the people who have the food, harden their hearts against starving Russians in their own country? If so, less and less is her claim upon our sympathy, and her demand less forceful in her plea for relief.

As a matter of fact, Russia has made no appeal for relief. When and where did Russia present her petition for relief? It is the charity broker who has made Russia's business his own. It is Hoover who wants to reestablish that international charity work. Saddle it on us now, and you will find it harder to throw it off next time. You will be setting up here a precedent that will soon become a law which you can not resist.

Senators, I feel deeply on this subject. I was astounded yesterday when the leaders who were opposing this measure failed to call for a yea-and-nay vote. A junior in service to those who are leading that fight, I felt a delicacy in making the point then. I have thought the matter over. You will ask for unanimous consent for the adoption of the conference report. If I agreed to that, I would become a party to what you are doing. As an honest Senator——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, there is no conference report here, the Senator understands, so that is a matter which will come up later. The conferees have not met as yet.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it is well known to Senators that information gets into these corridors that sometimes does not get onto the floor, much less into the record. Note my prediction, Mr. President and Senators: The House conferees will throw out the amendments which were put on here, and which were accepted with great reluctance by the Senator who had charge of the bill, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Those amendments are going to be cast aside and we will be confronted with the proposition in its original form. Then you can not pass it without unanimous consent. Can I not be allowed to see a few feet in front of where I am walking? I know what is going to happen; I feel sure I do, at least, and I know that you can not pass that appropriation without unanimous consent, because you have not a quorum here in the city, and you can not get a quorum here. This is not going to be any Christmas gift to Mr. Hoover and the other charity brokers connected with his vast international benevolence.

The charity broker belongs to a profession. He never gives anything himself; he never does any work himself. His idea of charity is to go to Smith for aid when he sees Jones in distress. He never gives anything himself, and when the money comes in, the very first thing he does is to fix an enormous salary for himself. He takes it out of the charity fund as his commission. It is a brokerage business, and the charity broker is just as much a business man as the man who sells stocks and bonds.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, my attention was diverted, and I want to get clear what the Senator said about Mr. Hoover. Did the Senator refer to Mr. Hoover as getting a salary out of charitable funds?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. No; I did not say that.

Mr. KENYON. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I referred to charity brokers in general. I did say, at least by inference, that those who have been working in this international charity business have received salaries. I am sure that will not be denied.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator say that Mr. Hoover ever received any salary for his charitable work?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I have never said so, but I will say this, I think if he would make an accounting, accompanied by vouchers, of the enormous sums he did spend, he would add very much to the satisfaction of the American people.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, if the Senator felt, when the bill was pending, that somebody was going to filch a large part of it for salaries, why did he not offer an amendment that none of it should be paid for salaries, and thus prevent that?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. There were two reasons why no amendments were offered by me. One was that official business required my absence from the Chamber at the time the bill was pending. Another was that I did not wish by the presentation of any amendment to impliedly commit myself to the proposition. I very seriously considered that very thing, and I came to the conclusion that if I offered an amendment, I would be morally bound to support the bill if that amendment got into it.

Mr. President, there have been times when I was in grave doubt as to what to do. There have been times, as Senators remember, when I stood alone on this side of the Chamber. There may be times when I will again stand alone; but in this case I have no doubt whatever that this is a vicious precedent, and it will never be set with my consent. I will oppose it to the very end. I believe it wrong.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator has made some statements which were so contrary to my understanding that I wish to call his attention to the facts, and be sure that he is right about them. The Senator stated, as I understood him, that Mr. Hoover has never contributed anything to this charitable work.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator misunderstood me; I did not state that. What I did state, in the brief sketch I was making of the professional charity broker, was that this professional broker, who got charity funds from other people, would fix his own salary out of those funds, and that it was always an enormous salary.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Without discussing the merits of this measure at all, I wish to state that it has been my understanding that Mr. Hoover has not only contributed his time without any compensation, but that he has contributed many thousands of dollars of his own money toward charity.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator's understanding may or may not be in accord with the facts. I have not made any statement upon this subject. This is not a personal attack upon Mr. Hoover; it is an attack upon Hooverism. It is an attack upon this international relief business. There seems to be a kind of mania—engendered by the war, of course—to take American money and send it away, when every dollar of it is needed here at home.

I will refer the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] to the notorious fact that during the early period of the war there were vast sums taken up in New York for charity work; and the New York papers published the facts as to the salaries which had been allotted to themselves by these charity brokers. They were stupendous; and, of course, those men acted for themselves, put their own estimate on the value of their own services, and took their salaries out of the charity funds. Those facts were published in detail by the New York papers.

Here we are dealing with a country which admittedly has food supplies sufficient—if you could put up the price—and the price is about half of what we are paying here. Then it comes to this: Will Russia allow her own people to perish when Russia has the food with which to save them?

Speaking about Russia's assets, I mentioned yesterday the almost incalculable value of the oil fields in the Baku region. Those wells were spouting, some of them burning, when Alexander the Great passed through that region on his way to India. How long they have been burning and gushing there will never be known, but one of the most interesting books I ever examined is that which bears the title "Baku," published in London. It is a fascinating story of a natural asset of inestimable value.

Then there is the timber, and there are the minerals, some of which were mentioned by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] in the course of his argument the other day. There is not a country on earth more splendidly endowed by nature with undeveloped resources than Russia.

The distressed situation could be relieved by a cablegram, which would in 48 hours open the markets of Russia to the world, and open the markets of the world to Russia. That is the sensible course, it seems to me—with all respect to those who differ—which ought to be pursued. Lift that nation into the family of nations, recognize it as a self-governing nation. We are committed to the principle that all government rests upon the consent of the governed. The Russian people like this form of government. They sustain it with their blood, as well as their treasure and their service. We have no right to dictate to Russia. We have no right to dictate to any foreign land its form of government.

As a Christmas gift from the White House here in Washington City, let a cablegram go to St. Petersburg or to Moscow carrying the Christmas tidings of the recognition of their government. Then it would be like the angel song the shepherds heard on the plains of Judea on the night that Christ was born in the manger.

MARINE INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who desire to speak to-day, but I gave notice that I expected to call up a bill which I do not think will meet with any objection, and in order that there may be a measure before the Senate to which Senators may speak, I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

APPOINTMENT OF POSTMASTERS IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I presume that patronage has been a bone of contention and a source of trouble since the organization of our Government. I realize that in this country we have government by party, and I have no criticism to make of that; but I enter my vigorous protest, Mr. President, against the method of appointing postmasters in my section of the country.

If I were in power and had the distribution of offices, I would endeavor to be consistent and would not mislead the people. I would either have manhood enough to say that I would appoint the best men to office—and it would take a good deal of proof to convince me that my friends were not the best men—or I would leave the appointment of these officers to a vote of the community. If I undertook to have a civil-service examination, I would be honest and let the man making the highest mark, in the absence of anything against his character or his ability, receive the appointment.

I desire to have inserted as a part of my remarks the Executive orders of March 31, 1917, May 10, 1921, and July 27, 1921, on this point.

There being no objection, the orders referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Executive order of March 31, 1917, relating to post offices of the first, second, and third classes is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Hereafter when a vacancy occurs in the position of postmasters of any office of the first, second, or third class as the result of death, resignation, removal, or, on the recommendation of the First Assistant Postmaster General, approved by the Postmaster General, to the effect that the efficiency or need of the service requires that a change shall be made, if such vacancy is not filled by nomination of some person within the competitive classified civil service who has the required qualifications, then the Postmaster General shall certify the fact to the Civil Service Commission, which shall forthwith hold an open competitive examination to test the fitness of applicants to fill such vacancy, and when such examination has been held and the papers in connection therewith have been rated, the said commission shall certify the result thereof to the Postmaster General, who shall submit to the President the name of the highest qualified eligible for appointment to fill such vacancy, unless it is established that the character or residence of such applicant disqualifies him for appointment. No person who has passed his sixty-fifth birthday or who has not actually resided within the delivery of such office for two years next preceding such vacancy shall be given the examination herein provided for."

Executive order requiring examinations: Under the civil-service law, positions which are filled through nomination by the President for confirmation by the Senate are not included in the competitive classified service. Positions of postmaster at first, second, and third class post offices are filled in this manner. For such positions, however, examinations are held by the Civil Service Commission, at the request of the Postmaster General, under an Executive order issued May 10, 1921, revised July 27, 1921, which provides as follows:

"When a vacancy exists or hereafter occurs in the position of postmaster at an office of the first, second, or third class, if such vacancy is not filled by nomination of some person within the competitive classified civil service who has the required qualifications, then the Postmaster General shall certify the fact to the Civil Service Commission, which shall forthwith hold an open competitive examination to test the fitness of applicants to fill such vacancy, and when such examination has been held and the papers in connection therewith have been rated, the said commission shall certify the results thereof to the Postmaster General, who shall submit to the President the name of one of the highest three qualified eligibles for appointment to fill such vacancy unless it is established that the character or residence of any such applicant disqualifies him for appointment: Provided, That at the expiration of the term of any person appointed to such position through examination before the Civil Service Commission, the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, submit the name of such person to the President for renomination without further examination.

"No person who has passed his sixty-fifth birthday, or who has not actually resided within the delivery of such office for two years next preceding the date of examination, shall be given the examination herein provided for.

"If, under this order, it is desired to make nomination for any office of a person in the competitive classified service, such person must first be found by the Civil Service Commission to meet the minimum requirements for the office."

Mr. DIAL. The order under the former administration required that an examination be held, and that the person making the highest mark receive the appointment. That order was changed on May 10 and July 27 of the present year. Under the present system the Civil Service Commission holds an examination and certifies the names of the three parties making the highest marks, and one of that number is selected postmaster.

I consider that method hypocrisy, camouflage, misleading, a subterfuge, and anything else wrong you might denominate it. In my section of the country it is merely aiding the Republicans to debauch weak men. I have no complaint to make of a man who is a Republican from principle. He has just as much right to his opinions as I have to mine and they are entitled to just as much respect as mine are, notwithstanding I think he shows poor judgment. In my State we have only a few men who are entitled to be called Republicans. There are not enough to fill the offices under the administration. Hence after the election we hear of some birds of pilgrimage, I believe they call them, or birds of flight, coming down there, turning up with the claim of being Republicans. I am going to list a few of those to show the operations under the Republican administration.

I hold in my hand a circular from the American Legion, dated December 13, 1921, praising the honorable Postmaster General for his very liberal treatment of the soldier. Certainly the Legion was not posted as to the decisions and acts of the Post Office Department. I would be glad to have them look further into the subject and to get more light. No doubt the Legion intends well, and they are entitled to the praise of the country for trying to take care of that most magnificent and deserving body of men, the soldiers.

I also have in my hand a letter from the Post Office Department dated December 17 of this year, in which, among other things, it is said:

In accordance with the Executive order of May 10, 1921, a candidate for appointment at a presidential office must have resided within the actual delivery of the office to which he seeks appointment for at least two years next preceding the date of the examination.

They lay down that proposition; in fact, they make it necessary that an applicant shall be a citizen of the State and shall have resided in the precincts of the post office for two years next preceding appointment. The general requirements are:

To be eligible for examination for a position as postmaster at an office of the first, second, or third class, a candidate must be a citizen of the United States; must actually reside within the delivery of the office for which the application is made; must have so resided for at least two years next preceding the date of the examination.

The President made two orders on the subject. One was that the applicant must have so resided for two years next before the vacancy. I do not know that this order was changed because of the condition in South Carolina, but perhaps it was; at least it looks a little bit suspicious. The order was changed to read that the applicant must be a resident two years before the examination. I desire to cite a case in point.

I wish to state first, however, that we down South are glad to welcome all good people to our section who come down there and want to cast their lot among us, but we would like to get acquainted with them and would like for them to have time enough to unpack their baggage and become somewhat acclimated before they set themselves up to ask for the best office in the gift of the people in that community.

The fourth office, I believe, in importance in South Carolina is Spartanburg. Last August the incumbent's time expired. The Post Office Department asked the Civil Service Commission to order an examination. The examination was ordered, and in the meantime the Post Office Department appointed a gentleman as acting postmaster. Then the order for the examination was canceled at the request of the Post Office Department. No examination has yet been held, and this gentleman is still holding the office. This is in the adjoining county to where I live.

I do not know the young man who is holding the office, and I have not heard a word against his character and I am saying nothing against his character. He has family connections in my State of the highest. They are among the best people of the South. But this young man hails from the North, and it does seem to me that he connected himself up with an office pretty quickly after he got into South Carolina. I think he claims to be from both New Jersey and Massachusetts and perhaps New York, backed up by the mighty influence of the Grand Old Party. But let us trace the case around a little bit and see what he has done in South Carolina.

The records in the office of the judge of probate of Spartanburg County, S. C., show that on August 29, 1919, H. T. E. Newberger obtained a license to wed—I do not care to name the lady—at Spartanburg, S. C., and gave his residence as Elmira, N. Y. The marriage ceremony was performed by the Rev. Mr. So-and-so at Spartanburg. The books of the supervisors of registration for that county show that on August 12, 1921, H. T. E. Newberger obtained a registration certificate entitling him to vote.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. DIAL. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With the permission of the Senator from South Carolina I wish to corroborate and support his position by stating this fact: The patronage in the State of Georgia is now being dispensed by a citizen of Pennsylvania, who lives in Philadelphia. He is not now and never has been a citizen of my State. He has run sawmills down there, but his home is in Philadelphia. He has never paid any taxes in the town or county in Georgia in which he claims residence. He never was a registered voter in the town of Thomasville, where he now claims to live, until January of this year. Yet that man from Philadelphia is naming the appointees to all the offices in my State and there is a strong current opinion that he is making money out of it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator from South Carolina will permit me——

Mr. DIAL. Certainly.

Mr. KING. The South ought by this time to be used to carpet baggers, because they have had so many under the Republican régime. Why should not they expect now a revival, a recrudescence, of the policy that obtained under Republican misrule?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It came upon us with such suddenness that we had no time to prepare ourselves for it. However, I am going to try to get rid of it.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, this shows that at the time Mr. Newberger got his license to marry he was a resident of the State of New York. The books of the supervisor of registration for that county show that on August 12, 1921, he obtained a registration certificate entitling him to vote—not two years. Was appointed acting postmaster August 15, 1921.

Section 4 of article 2 of the constitution of 1895 of the State of South Carolina provides:

> The qualifications for suffrage shall be as follows: (a) Residence in the State for two years, in the county one year, in the polling precinct in which the elector is entitled to vote for four months, and the payment six months before any election of any poll tax then due and payable—

And so forth.

Section 378 of the Criminal Code of 1912 makes receiving a fraudulent registration certificate a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine not exceeding $200 or by imprisonment at hard labor for not more than three months, in the discretion of the court.

The books show that Newberger made no tax return and paid no taxes in 1920.

Now, Mr. President, I look on that procedure as unjust and injurious to the people of the country and as a reflection upon the people of South Carolina. As I said, I have nothing to say against the character of Mr. Newberger because I do not know him and have not heard anything against him, but in behalf of the people who always try to do their duty I am entering my protest against such procedure.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. DIAL. Certainly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am heartily in sympathy with the views entertained by the Senator from South Carolina and think that it is really very unjust treatment which is being extended to certain sections of the country on the part of the Republican administration.

I know in my State of a case where recently a newcomer to the State has been appointed to one of the best post offices in Florida, a gentleman from Pennsylvania who never paid any taxes in Florida and never had anything to do with the civic development and affairs of the community in which he now lives. He came there working for some company that is operating a mercantile establishment there, but has nothing in common with the interests of the locality and the community; yet he has been recommended and appointed to one of the best post offices in Florida. That happened very shortly after he came there from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DIAL. He probably never was known to be a Republican until after the election.

Mr. TRAMMELL. There are plenty of good Republicans in that community and that locality. There was another Republican who was an applicant, who to my certain knowledge has lived there for some 10 or 12 years, one of the most excellent gentlemen I ever knew. I have no comment on the man who was appointed except that he was not entitled to that office. Yet the Republican organization turned down a good Republican, a fine citizen, thoroughly capable and on the list of eligibles, and appointed this newcomer from Pennsylvania to one of the most important post offices in Florida.

Mr. DIAL. That is all true. The evidence is accumulating. Now, Mr. President, let us see about the soldier. The Republican Party claim the soldier is their great pet, that they are the guardians of the soldier. They have camouflaged the American Legion into praising the Postmaster General. Let us see now what they did at Greenville, S. C., which I believe is the third most important office in the State of South Carolina. Out of the list of those who took the examination Maj. W. F. Robertson made 79, and under the order of the President which gives him 5 per cent preferential because of being a soldier, his mark was 84. Robert T. Thorn made 72.80. Charles C. Withington made 67.40, plus the soldier preferential of 5 per cent, making his mark equal to 72.40.

Mr. President, Maj. Robertson is a native, I believe, of North Carolina, but was raised in South Carolina, and has held many important positions in that State. He is a man of the highest character and of great ability. I might say that he helped to organize companies in the recent World War, went to France, did his duty, and is held in the highest esteem by the people from the mountains to the seaboard of South Carolina. He stood the examination and made the highest mark.

The next man is Mr. Thorn, who I understand—I merely met him once or twice—is a very clever Republican. I do not know very much about him. Mr. Withington made 67.40, plus 5 on account of soldier preference, a total of 72.40, against Maj. Robertson's 84. Mr. Withington is a Massachusetts gentleman. I think he even claims to be called Coolidge Withington. He is well connected. He has been in South Carolina a few years only, possibly a little longer than the man from New Jersey, in the neighboring town of Spartanburg; but Mr. Withington, too, was so well pleased with the South that he married one of the most charming girls in that beautiful land. He also is well connected. I understand he is a splendid young man. I have received, perhaps, 50 telegrams in his behalf.

But, Mr. President, I have a duty to perform to the people of this country. I want to see that justice is parceled out to every man. I am told—although I do not know and do not vouch for the statement—that Mr. Withington's name is not on the tax books; that he has never even voted; that he has taken no part in the upbuilding and the activities of the splendid city of Greenville and the county in which it is located; that he is a bookkeeper, a man of good character and good standing, and competent, perhaps. The Republican Party, however, say that they have to give that office to a soldier. When they give it to a soldier, why give it to the soldier who made only 72.40 instead of giving it to a home soldier who made 84? I should like to know, Mr. President, if over in France when Maj. Robertson was charging the Germans and striving to break the Hindenburg line, the Republican Party inquired whether he was a Democrat or a Republican? That is the condition we are up against.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DIAL. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from South Carolina has not yet stated whether the nomination to which he refers was made?

Mr. DIAL. Withington's name was sent in, though he was the man who made the lowest mark.

Mr. FLETCHER. Withington has received the nomination?

Mr. DIAL. He has received the nomination.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from South Carolina can very readily see the purpose and intent back of this order which requires that civil-service examinations shall be held and that three names must be certified as eligible for appointment.

Mr. DIAL. The purpose of that order is to give the Republicans a loophole to appoint a Republican.

Mr. FLETCHER. It gives the nominating authority the right to select any one of the three, without regard to which one receives the highest mark.

Mr. DIAL. Absolutely. Spending the people's money holding examinations to deceive them. The order of President Harding giving soldiers a preferential of five points can be of no possible service to the soldier except where he does not make a passing mark of 70. To increase his rating and then not to select him, even when he has made the highest mark, is merely adding insult to disappointment.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is a purpose behind it, of course. The old rule was that the one receiving the highest mark in the examination would get the nomination.

Mr. DIAL. Exactly.

Mr. FLETCHER. But that has been done away with now under the new régime, and the President will select, on the recommendation of the Post Office Department, of course, any one of the three, so that the appointing power is given the opportunity to select a good Republican.

In addition to that, where examinations have been called and held and only one has passed the examination and others examined have failed to make the required mark to become eligible, the department holds that they will not appoint that one, where he does not suit, where he is not a good Republican, for instance, but that they will call another examination and keep on calling other examinations until they get the names of three eligibles.

Mr. DIAL. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. The purpose of that is, of course, not to obey the civil service law; they are not controlled by the civil service law at all. The purpose is to continue this process until they can get, possibly, a Republican who is qualified, and then they will appoint that Republican, whether he has the highest mark or not. Is not that the way it operates?

Mr. DIAL. They did that at Atlanta, Ga., the other day.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely. Now, in addition to that, where the examination has been held in pursuance of the rules and only one applicant has qualified—and such an instance recently occurred in Florida—and that one happens to be a good Republican, he is the right man; he is the one they want and he is at once nominated; but in another instance, in another community, where there was an examination held and only one passed and he happened to be a Democrat, they immediately called another examination and would not appoint the one who qualified under the previous examination. That is the way it operates.

Mr. DIAL. And in another case, where they all failed, the name of the Republican was sent in.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether he considers that legal? Does he not think that that is a palpable violation of the law; and does he not think that we ought to refuse to confirm any person who is subsequently nominated where it has been demonstrated, and the evidence is before us, that some other person who took the examination, secured the highest mark, but was refused the appointment because he did not happen to be indorsed by Republican politicians?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think unquestionably it is an evasion of the law.

Mr. KING. In such a case, I think, we ought to refuse to confirm the nominee; and, so far as I am concerned, if I know of any case like that, I shall oppose confirmation.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator from Utah is right about that.

With reference to ex-soldiers, section 6 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1919, provides:

> That hereafter in making appointments to clerical and other positions in the executive and in independent governmental establishments preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marine, and widows of such, if they are qualified to hold such positions.

Mr. DIAL. But it is said that law will not apply.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am coming to that. Under the act approved June 11, 1919, there is a similar provision which reads:

> * * * Provided, That the act entitled "An act to provide for the fourteenth and subsequent decennial censuses," approved March 3, 1919, so far as it relates to preference in employment of honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, be amended to read as follows: "That hereafter in making appointments to clerical and other positions in the executive branch of the Government in the District of Columbia or elsewhere preference shall be given to honorably discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines, and widows of such, and to the wives of injured soldiers, sailors, and marines who themselves are not qualified but whose wives are qualified to hold such positions.

The department claims that that law is unconstitutional; at any rate, that it conflicts with the President's authority under the Constitution to appoint without any sort of limitation, and they do not observe it; but they say, "We are going to do this: We will give the ex-soldiers a preference mark of five points," just as was done in the case at Spartanburg to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, it appears that the Senator from South Carolina has the floor and is farming it out to Senators to make speeches. I am going to raise that point of order unless the Senator from South Carolina will give me about an hour to ask him a question.

Mr. DIAL. If it is going to take that long, I will have to decline to yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think there is no time being lost in this matter, because it is directly in point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. DIAL. I shall be glad to yield for a question, but I desire to hurry along.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not want to take the Senator off his feet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from South Carolina to the fact that, under the rules, he can not yield for more than a question if the point of order is raised.

Mr. DIAL. Very well; I decline to be interrupted further, Mr. President.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will not interrupt the Senator. I can address the Senate when I please and have all the time I desire. I am not going to take the Senator from South Carolina off the floor.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I want to say in behalf of Maj. Robertson, the gentleman from Greenville, to whom I have referred, and who is one of the best business men in our State, that he makes no contention whatever for this office; in fact, he immediately wired me that, so far as he was concerned, he would say no more about it and would let the matter drop. We therefore said to the committee that Mr. Withington would not be opposed, but we want to be dignified about the matter; we want to put our rights clearly before the Senate and let them understand our position, and also at the same time let the public understand it.

Mr. President, our Republican friends say they love the soldier. Let us see about that. At Clinton, S. C., a splendid town in my county, and very near my home, three names were sent in by the Civil Service Commission—Mr. A. J. Milling, who made 83; Mr. William M. McMillan, who made 78.20; and Mr. R. H. Blakely, who made 75.80. Mr. Milling is a near Republican, I believe it is claimed, but I do not believe it, and is connected with the distributor of patronage in South Carolina. I have no charge against him. He made, as I have said, the highest mark, and under the former administration he would have received the appointment. I think myself he should receive the appointment, unless it is going to be given to a soldier. Mr. McMillan, who is the present postmaster, made a mark of 78.20. He is a most excellent man. Mr. Blakely is a fine young man, an ex-soldier, and made 75.80. The department says to Mr. Blakely, however, "We can not give the appointment to you as a soldier; we are bound by the highest mark, and we are going to give it to Mr. Milling." Thus they blow hot and blow cold, giving it to a soldier when it suits them, and when it does not giving it to some one else. What we want is consistency and good service for the people.

Let us take the situation at Orangeburg, another magnificent city in South Carolina. Dr. Albert C. Ligon, the present postmaster, a Democrat, made 83.60. Dr. Ligon has filled that office most acceptably for certainly eight years and perhaps longer.

The next man on the list has connections in the North, one A. D. Webster, an old-line Republican, who was postmaster there, I think, for some 12 or 18 years under former Republican administrations. I am told that he made a very good postmaster. Mr. President, both of those men having been postmasters and having served the people most acceptably, must be well qualified to discharge the duties of the office, but here comes along one B. J. Mixson, who has never been postmaster, who has never been a post-office clerk, and who has had no experience, so far as I know or can find out. He made a mark of 76.60. He received the appointment, and the department was in such a big hurry about it that they appointed him acting postmaster.

So I want to inquire whether or not the Post Office Department is trying to give good service to the people, the best service to the people—whether they are trying to reward merit or whether they are just farming the offices out.

The Senator from Georgia has said that there is some talk in Georgia that there is a quid pro quo for these offices. The same report has spread all over our State. I heard before certain names were sent here that certain names would be sent in and that there was a consideration; but when it comes to proof people do not want their names to be used, and if they do not care to volunteer the evidence I do not care to try to go around and hunt up dirt, but the people of the country believe it, Mr. President.

In my State it is not a Republican Party, but it is a family party. The distributor of the offices has put about all of his kinspeople in office.

Mr. President, another objection to this so-called examination is this: By that method we tend to dissatisfy the citizens of the United States. When a man has been invited into a competitive examination, and when he stands that examination and makes the highest mark, and when his character is all right, then when he is turned down for a less efficient man he becomes dissatisfied with his Government. He says he has not been treated honestly and fairly, and he has a right to be dissatisfied with his Government. That is not the kind of principle we should bestow upon the people of this country. We want the people to support their Government. We want them to feel that they have been treated right by the people who are in power.

The Republicans can build up no party in my State. I would not care if they did. They have nothing there to lose or to win.

Therefore it does seem to me that that party ought to stand for the best interests of everybody, and that it should leave these offices to the ones receiving the highest mark, instead of parceling them out to some disgruntled people down there. There are a few native Democrats around there that claim they are kind of Republicans now, but they are not really Republicans. There are just a few of them who are pouting a little bit at the Democratic Party. They are not, and they are never going to be, Republicans.

Mr. President, another office I might speak of is Georgetown, down on the coast, a most pleasant place to live. To-day I was notified that the postmaster selected down there was from the great State of Indiana, down in South Carolina a little while; and he is following the laudable, the high, and the dignified position of running a Negro theater! That is the kind of man you give the good people of Georgetown. So it seems, Mr. President, that we are used as a colony, to send there men from the different parts of this country to rule over us. They try to put us almost in serfdom, as it were.

Something has been said here about the carpetbagger. I was not old enough to remember much about the days of reconstruction. It is said that Gen. Sherman said that war was hell, and from what I can remember of reconstruction that could well be denominated in the same way. These carpetbaggers came in by streams from the North. They issued bonds on our State and sold them and stole the money, and we got no benefit whatever from it; and the people of that country, after being impoverished by the war, were compelled to repudiate those bonds, and that has been a stigma upon our character ever since. I believe we have been made to pay in interest more than the amount of those bonds since that time. I am sorry that our country ever had to perform that act, but there was nothing else to do. My Republican friends can well see that we have not a very sweet taste in our mouths nor a deep place in our hearts for the so-called carpetbagger. While I believe that perhaps some of those who are coming down there now have improved in their strain a little bit, and while I hope they are a great improvement over their forbears, as I say, we are still a little bit doubtful and suspicious of them.

The postmasters of this country performed a great service to this country during the war. They worked in season and out of season to aid the Government in selling bonds, in the Red Cross, and in every other good activity within their power, and they are entitled to receive fair, just, liberal, and honest treatment at the hands of the administration.

Mr. President, I feel that it is my duty to expose the way in which these offices are being parceled out. I do not believe that fair Republicans approve of any such methods, and I am glad that our home people are dignified and acting like Maj. Robertson acts; but I am going to leave it now to the Republicans to say what they are going to do. So far as I am concerned, if a man is of good character and is competent, and if they want to select him in that method, they can have the office; but if they send in here the name of anyone who is not of good character, I expect to ask the Senate to reject him.

MICHIGAN SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. KENYON addressed the Senate in opposition to Senate resolution 172, declaring Truman H. Newberry to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan. After having spoken for some time,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (S. 2263) to amend the Federal reserve act approved December 23, 1913.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside. I understand that we have already agreed to take a vote on a certain day on the unfinished business, so that no one will be embarrassed by its postponement at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I desire to take this opportunity to make a few observations with reference to a matter that is not now before the Senate, but that will be when we reconvene, namely, the increasing cost of senatorial seats.

I shall be compelled to be away, I think, the first two or three days of the session following the holiday recess, and after that time, under the unanimous-consent agreement, I believe there is some provision for limiting the time that a Senator may have to discuss the case. So I think now will be a fairly good time to say what I have to say, as I could not say it within the limitations that I understand the unanimous-consent agreement embodies. Besides that, however, there is no particular business now for the Senate to consider. I appreciate full well that nothing that is said in the Newberry case will affect any votes in the Senate of the United States, although what is said may go to the people of the country, and Senators may hear from them.

Mr. President, no more unpleasant duty ever devolved upon a Member of this body than to cast a vote that a colleague is not entitled to his seat. My aversion to the corruption of elections and the large expenditure of money in securing seats in this body is so strong that I have sometimes feared that it swayed my judgment. Therefore I have endeavored to be particularly careful in examining the evidence in this matter, and I want to argue it as if it were a case in court. I dislike to disagree with a good many of my colleagues on this side of the Chamber. I have the highest respect for them all; and it seems to me that we, as Senators here, can disagree with each other without affecting the cordial personal regard that we have for one another.

Twice before during my service here the Senate has been presented with the question of the alleged corrupt election of Members of this body. In the Lorimer case the testimony was so conclusive that he was denied a seat. The Stephenson case, with an expenditure of around $107,000 in the primary and the election, so shocked the conscience of the American people, as reflected in this body, that, as I now remember it, 34 votes were cast against Mr. Stephenson having a right to a seat here and 40 in his favor. The third case is now presented to us. I have divorced entirely the personal element therefrom, because I have great respect and affection for Mr. Newberry, and I believe he has been a patriotic American citizen, earnestly devoted to his country and interested in its welfare; that he and his family were intensely patriotic during the war and rendered splendid service to the Government. These are matters that undoubtedly will sway many Senators in their votes. I confess there is a great persuasive force in them, but for my part I can not close my eyes to what seems to me a shameful and deliberate use of money to influence the electorate of the great State of Michigan, a use that can not be continued if representative government is to be maintained. It has seemed to be assumed by some in the Chamber that this is merely a question between Mr. Newberry and the Senate. There is a great third party in all this, and that third party is the public interest. The public interest is supreme to the Senate's desires or to Mr. Newberry's election.

As to the law of the case, I want to make the following propositions:

Regardless of any statutes, Federal or State, such a large sum of money may be expended in the election of a Senator or Congressman as to taint the entire matter and justify refusal of a seat. The line of demarcation would be difficult to draw, but if the sum expended were such as to shock public conscience so that it was in effect a breach of public policy, it would vitiate the election, even though there were no violation of the statutes. There might be such a wholesale corruption of voters by the purchase of influence that under their constitutional right to determine the election the Senate could well say that the election was tainted at its source. It is against the fundamentals of our Government. It is violative of those ethics that should be maintained in a free Republic.

It was contended in the Stephenson case by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] that in order to hold the election invalid there must be a violation of law; that acts which show moral turpitude on the part of a Senator are not involved in an investigation of his election, but properly come under a question of expulsion; but the Senator from Ohio and I differed very greatly on that proposition.

If a person is elected, it makes no difference in determining the validity of the election whether he is a gambler, a thief, a bank robber, or anything else; he might still be elected, and the question of his fitness for the office would be determined on a motion to expel him, but the question of corrupting the primary electorate is a question that goes to the election, and even though the statutes of a State may not forbid certain things, the Senate has a right to consider them as corrupting and fraudulent, and to vitiate the entire election.

I call attention to the case of Cameron, petitioner, v. MacDougall (Hodgins Cases, 376). It was held that treating—> was not per se a corrupt act except when made so by statute, but the intent of the party treating may make it so, and the intent must be judged by all the circumstances by which it is attended. When it is done by a candidate in order to make for himself a reputation for good fellowship and hospitality, and thereby to influence electors to vote for him, it is a species of bribery which would void his election at the common law.

Some of the things that would amount to corruption, though not prohibited by statute, may occur to our minds—for instance, excessive treating to influence voters. Suppose it could be conceived in these times that enough money could be spent in a

State to get 51 per cent of the voters so drunk they could not get to the polls on election day, a situation that could not arise, of course, under prohibition, but you could imagine it. It would violate no statute, but if it could be shown to the Senate, it certainly would be sufficient ground to hold that the election was corrupt. In other words, acts that prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage may be held to be corrupting acts. Excessive payments for advertising to secure newspaper support and treating are things that would come under this category, even though not prohibited by statute.

Cushing, in his work on the Law of Legislative Assemblies, says:

The great principle which lies at the foundation of all elective governments and an essential, indeed, to the very idea of election is that the electors shall be free in the giving of their suffrages. The principle was declared by the English Parliament in the Declaration of Rights. The same principle is asserted or implied in the constitutions of all the States of the Union.

Freedom of election is violated by external violence, by which the electors are constrained, or by bribery, by which their will is corrupted; and in all cases where the electors are prevented in either of these ways from the free exercise of their rights the election will be void, without reference to the number of votes thereby affected.

I ask to have printed in the RECORD an extract from Shepard on Elections, page 97.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Besides the practice of purchasing individual votes, there sprang up a corruption far more extensive, in which the commanding influence in a borough was transferred, either by a sum of money paid down at once or, with a more accurate calculation of traffic, for an annual payment during the continuance of Parliament, the sitting member thus purchasing the return of him who had previously purchased the power of returning. To repress this practice the 49 George III, chapter 118, was passed, by which it was made highly penal to enter into any pecuniary engagement for procuring the return of a member of Parliament.

Mr. KENYON. The Caldwell case, before this body many years ago, was a case where a man was paid a sum of money not to be a candidate in the caucus. In discussing that case Senator Morton said:

The principles of the common law are applicable in all civil matters touching the validity of elections or the tenure of office, and it is a well-established principle of the common law that whatever impairs the "freedom of elections" is illegal and against public policy and will make the election void.

In the Stephenson case the distinguished Senator from Utah, Mr. Sutherland, who took the same position as that taken by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], that there must be statutes violated, said this, which I would like to have in the RECORD:

As I understand the rule of law, it is that a presumption arises in all cases, in criminal law or civil law, in favor of the regularity and honesty of the doings, either of individuals or of officials. That is a general presumption of law. When anybody challenges that presumption, it devolves upon that person to overcome that presumption by proof. In this particular case the expenditure of money in the election may or may not have been honest.

This is the point I want to make:

The presumption is that it was honest; but in putting in the proof it may appear that the amount of the expenditure was so extravagant as in itself to overcome the presumption in favor of the honesty of the transaction and shift the burden of proof to show that it was an honest expenditure or it may be accompanied by other badges of suspicion that will overcome the general presumption and shift the burden of proof.

I do not want to be extravagant either way, but in this case, in which it can be fairly gathered from the record that $263,000 at least was spent in this election, the burden of proof would shift, so as to call for an explanation of that expenditure.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but can he tell us the population of Michigan?

Mr. KENYON. I will ask the senior Senator from Michigan the population of the State; is it three and a half million?

Mr. TOWNSEND. About three and a half million.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I do not know the population of Wisconsin, but $107,000 was spent in the Stephenson case.

In the Caldwell case, to which I have referred, the venerable Senator from Vermont, Mr. Morrill, expressed surprise that the sum of $15,000 had been spent, and he expressed the opinion that it was the largest amount of money spent for corruption in the history of senatorial elections.

I want to have printed in the RECORD an extract from the minority report in the Payne case, signed by Senators Teller, Evarts, and Logan, page 711 of the Senate Election Cases, and I ask to have that go in without taking the time to read it.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

We have in our conclusions made no distinction between the use of fraud, corruption, or bribery in a caucus vote or in a legislative vote for a Senator. Although a caucus or what proceeds in it has no constitutional or legal relation to the election of a Senator, yet by the habit of political parties, the stage of determination as to who is to be elected Senator, and the influences, proper or improper, that produce that determination is that which precedes and is concluded in the caucus. So far as the question of personal delinquency or turpitude is concerned, no moral distinction should be taken between corrupt proceedings in caucus and those in the legislature. How far any such distinction would need to be insisted upon in any case on the question of unseating a Senator where he himself was not affected with any personal misconduct or complicity with the misconduct of others, we have no occasion in the immediate case or attitude of the subject to consider or suggest.

Mr. KENYON. Also, from the same election case, I ask to have printed a portion of a report signed by Senator Hoar and Senator Frye.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

What is the effect upon an election of Senator of bribery of voters in a caucus of the legislators who are to make the choice is a question upon which we prefer not to form an opinion until the evidence is before us. The members of a caucus ordinarily deem themselves bound in honor to vote in the election for the person whom it nominates by the vote of a majority on condition that such person belonged to their party and is fit for the office in point of character and ability. Bribery, therefore, which changes the result in the caucus, would ordinarily determine the election.

If B, C, and D have promised to vote as A shall vote, if A be corrupted 4 votes are gained by the process, although B, C, and D be innocent. In looking, therefore, to see whether an election by the legislature was procured or effected by bribery, it may be very important to discover whether that bribery procured the nomination of a caucus whose action a majority of the legislature were bound in honor to support.

Mr. KENYON. I have already referred to the remarks of Senator Morton in the Caldwell case, so they are in the RECORD. I make that as the first proposition of law applicable to this case, that the amount of money expended is so tremendous as to be a badge of fraud and corruption, at least to the extent of placing the burden of proof on the parties to explain it.

Second, the law enacted by Congress was violated. That law provided that the candidate could not expend over $10,000 by himself in a senatorial election or have the same expended with his knowledge and consent, of course with the exceptions which are properly included within the law.

Mr. Newberry knew of that law at the start of his campaign. The law had not then been declared unconstitutional. In his conversation with Mr. King he was advised that the campaign would cost over $50,000, so he knew that much money, at least, must be expended, and in the opening statement to the jury in the trial in Michigan, Mr. Murfin, counsel for Senator Newberry, stated the matter very completely. Speaking of the meeting in New York, he said:

The commander said: "How much did it cost Senator TOWNSEND'S friends to nominate and elect Senator TOWNSEND?" Mr. King said it cost a little over $20,000, but, "Commander, it will cost your men more than that, because Senator TOWNSEND has been a Congressman, has been on the stump, and you are not as well known as your prospective opponents, and I judge it would cost two or three times as much money from your friends as it cost Senator TOWNSEND'S friends."

So that unless the money was to be used for the exceptions given in the law, Mr. Newberry had notice that the amount to be expended would be in excess of the amount provided by the national act.

It is true that the law has been declared unconstitutional, on the theory that Congress could not regulate primaries, and apparently because primaries were unknown at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. As a lawyer, I am compelled, as all other lawyers are, to accept the decision of the court, and accept it unmurmuringly, but of course it might be suggested that railroads were not known, either, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, nor telegraphs nor telephones.

The Supreme Court, however, did not clear Mr. Newberry. Some of the language on that subject is important. I realize that as a question of law this is where lawyers might differ. Has the Supreme Court taken away from the Congress the right to inquire into primary elections? Have we nothing to do with them under the Constitution? I say no; they have not so held. They have decided in this case that we can not regulate primaries. Primaries are not a part of the term "election" as used in the Constitution. The court said:

The ultimate question for solution here is whether under the grant of power to regulate "the manner of holding elections" Congress may fix the maximum sum which a candidate therein may spend, or advise or cause to be contributed and spent by others to procure his nomination.

Section 4, Article I, of the Constitution provides that—

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Quoting further from the court, they say:

Primaries were then unknown. Moreover, they are in no sense elections for an office, but merely methods by which party adherents agree upon candidates whom they intend to offer and support for ultimate choice by all qualified electors. General provisions touching elections in constitutions or statutes are not necessarily applicable to primaries—the two things are radically different.

But Justice McReynolds, who wrote the opinion, said in the close of it:

It should not be forgotten that, exercising inherent police power, the State may suppress whatever evils may be incident to primary or convention. As "each House shall be the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own Members," and as Congress may by law regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections, the National Government is not without power to protect itself against corruption, fraud, or other malign influences.

He does not say in the primary, but that the general powers still remain.

[At this point, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the unfinished business was laid before the Senate, and was temporarily laid aside.]

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, if as a legal proposition anybody can do anything in the primary, spend a million dollars, for instance, and the Senate can not inquire into it, of course that is the end of this case. If the Supreme Court settles that as the proposition there is no use of discussing it further.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. If the Senate could inquire into expenditures made by Senator Stephenson, regardless of the fact that they were made in a primary, or even if they were not, why may we not inquire into expenditures made in a primary or anterior to a primary, with a view to determining whether or not the conduct of the Senator is such as to justify his retention in the Senate of the United States?

Mr. KENYON. I say we can.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly.

Mr. KENYON. But I know the argument is made that we can not. The Senator will remember that when the Stephenson case was before the Senate we had not had this opinion of the Supreme Court, that the primary was unknown at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and consequently the fathers could not have had it in mind.

Chief Justice White, gone to his great reward, a State rights man, a soldier in the Confederate Army, dissented from that kind of a doctrine, and I submit that his language, while it can not be controlling, can be instructive to the Senate. He said:

In the last analysis the contention—

That is, the contention about which I have been talking—must rest upon the proposition that there is such absolute want of relation between the power of Government to regulate the right of the citizen to seek a nomination for a public office and its authority to regulate the election after nomination that a paramount Government authority having the right to regulate the latter is without any power as to the former. The influence of who is nominated for elective office upon the result of the election to fill that office is so known of all men that the proposition may be left to destroy itself by its own statement.

He said further:

Moreover, the proposition, impliedly at least, excludes from view the fact that the powers conferred upon Congress by the Constitution carry with them the right "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers" (Art. I, sec. 8, cl. 18), and in doing so virtually disregards the previous legislative history and the decisions of this court sanctioning the same, to which we have referred, since that practice and those decisions unmistakably recognize that the power under the clause in question extends to all the prerequisites and appropriate incidents necessary to the discharge of the authority given.

So that each House, being the judge of the qualifications and election returns of its own Members, has the right to go into the primary, possibly not on the theory that the primary is a part of the election, but on the theory that the primary is an agency leading up to the election, and if that agency is corrupted the election may be corrupted.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. KENYON. I will yield in just a moment. We may define the word "stream." The stream does not include a creek, but the water that flows down from the creek may pollute the stream, and in order to clean the stream we may have to go up the creek, even though the creek had not been known when the Constitution was adopted.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Suppose it be true that there is no power in the Congress to pass a law making it a crime for a candidate for office to corrupt the electorate in the primary election; does it at all follow that Congress, because it can not make it a felony to interfere with a primary election, can not expel a man for corrupt practices in a primary election?

Mr. KENYON. Exactly. The Senator has drawn the distinction which other Senators draw, that we can expel a man, which requires a two-thirds vote, but we can not declare the election tainted.

Mr. REED. Suppose, and it is true, that Congress has no power to pass a law to penalize murder except the murder be committed on governmental territory; but suppose a man were to cut his wife's throat in cold blood and with the stain still on his hands come here and ask admission, or having been admitted, should be guilty of so heinous an offense, clearly our right would exist to protect this body by refusing admission.

Mr. KENYON. There is no question about that. Now, the Senator is raising a question right there. If a man came here a murderer, but had his certificate of election and had been duly elected by his State, could we refuse him admittance or would we have to expel him?

Mr. REED. I think we can do either. But I am speaking now of the thing that occurs particularly after election. Suppose in getting elected—let us say in one of the Southern States where a nomination upon the Democratic ticket is equivalent to the election—the governor of the State in the primary is a candidate for the nomination and he should turn out the militia to drive the voters away from the polls, and allow only his friends to vote and in that way secure the nomination. Would the Senate be powerless to refuse him a seat or to expel him, even though in a case like that the Senate might have no power to punish him for the crime committed in his own State?

Mr. KENYON. I say no. I am trying to put this as strongly against my own position, to see if I can argue it down. I say under this decision of the Supreme Court, which a great many Senators are going to follow, their theory is that though we have nothing whatever to do with the primary on the question of a man's right to his seat ab initio, we may expel him for acts in the primary.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator. I was about to say what the Senator has already said in answer to the Senator from Missouri. The Senator's question implies that he would answer it in the affirmative, and I quite agree with him. I think we would have undoubtedly the power to expel a man, although we might not have the power to punish him for the offense upon which the basis for expulsion rested.

Mr. KENYON. Since the Senator from Missouri has mentioned the question of force, it is exactly the same if you kept people away from the polls by force as if you corrupted them to stay away. I would have the Senator from Missouri some time read the very interesting speech of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] in the Stephenson case. I will read a little of it on that very point. The Senator from Washington at that time said:

An undoubted fact in this case is that at the primary election in Wisconsin the nomination of the Senator who now sits from that State was brought about by the use of money. The only parallel that could be exercised would be the use of force—

Possibly the Senator from Missouri has read this speech?

Mr. REED. No; I have not.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Washington continued—

and I submit, Mr. President, that the case under consideration is just as dangerous to our institutions, just as injurious to the respect which it is necessary to preserve among the people for the laws which are made in these bodies by the men who are chosen. These men who vote and cast frequently the determining vote, making laws affecting the property, the well-being of the entire Nation, menace our institutions just as much from the use of money in polluting and corrupting the ballot box as though a military force should stand at the polls herding the voters and directing them for whom to cast their votes.

That speech will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 27, 1912.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him——

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. The parallel drawn by the Senator from Iowa is apt, but it does not sufficiently express it. Physical violence, even to the point of physical subjection, can only end in inconvenience. The man who is made a physical slave is simply deprived of certain privileges. The use of corrupt influences does more than to enslave the body; it debauches the soul of a people, and a country, as I see it, is infinitely worse if it is corrupted than the country that is physically enslaved.

Mr. KENYON. I thank the Senator.

Even if the law is unconstitutional, the $10,000 limit fixes the policy of Congress as to the limit of what should be spent outside of the exceptions properly contained in the act. Furthermore, at the time this was spent it was not known by Mr. Newberry or by the committee that the act was unconstitutional. They went ahead with brazen affrontery, in complete disregard of the statutes passed by the American Congress.

How can it be said that the primary does not enter into the election; that it does not affect the election; that the election was perfectly legal; and that the means of arriving at this should be by means of expulsion? Did the workers who were employed stop at the end of the primary and not carry on their work to the conclusion? Did the newspapers cease in their efforts? Unquestionably, as far as the work was concerned, it went through into the election and in that way, at least, the primary is involved in the election.

Section 45 of the primary act of Michigan prohibiting the employment of workers on primary day and prior thereto has been beyond the question of doubt violated.

The third proposition of law to which I wish to refer is this: It is rather generally conceded that the Michigan law was violated.

Under section 3831, set out in minority report, at page 5, Mr. Newberry was compelled to file within 10 days after the primary election and within 20 days after the general election a statement in the office of the county clerk where he resided setting forth a detailed account, sworn to by him, of all moneys received or disbursed. That was not done, but no attention seems to have been paid to that.

Under section 3832 (minority report, p. 5) the certificate issued to him was an unlawful act, because he had not filed the statement required by section 3831.

The treasurer's report likewise does not conform to law. These matters are not enough to vitiate the election.

What the State may provide shall be done by a candidate after the election can not deprive him of his seat if he may fail to carry out these provisions, and I merely mention these as breaches of that law, not perhaps of very serious importance.

More important, however, are other phases of the statute. He was prohibited from spending over 50 per cent of his salary for any year, to wit, $3,750. This has been violated, as I shall show by the record, violated by his agents, who had full authority to act from him and for him time and again.

It may be well possibly at this point to insert in the RECORD the sections of the Michigan statutes, and I ask permission to insert in my remarks at this point sections 3831, 3832, and section 45 of the primary act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The sections referred to are as follows:

SEC. 3831. Every candidate and every treasurer of a political committee shall, within 10 days after any primary election, caucus, or convention, and again within 20 days after any general election, * * * in or concerning which he shall have received or disbursed any money, prepare and file in the office of the county clerk of the county in which such candidate or treasurer resides a full, true, and detailed account and statement, subscribed and sworn to by him before an officer authorized to administer oaths, setting forth each and every sum of money received or disbursed by him for nomination or election expenses, the date of each receipt, the name of the person from whom received, or to whom paid, and the person to whom and object or purpose for which disbursed. Such statements shall also set forth the unpaid debts and obligations, if any, of such candidate or committee incurred for the purposes set forth in section 3 of this act, with the nature and amount of each, and to whom owing, in detail, and if there are no such unpaid debts or obligations of such candidate or committee, such statement shall state such fact.

SEC. 3832. It shall be unlawful to administer the oath of office or to issue a commission or certificate of nomination or election to any person nominated or elected to any public office until he has filed an account as required by this act, which account shall upon its face be complete and show a lawful compliance with this act, etc.

SEC. 45. Every person who, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, gives, lends, or agrees to give or lend, or offers or promises any money or valuable consideration, or promises or endeavors to procure any money or valuable consideration or office, place, or employment, to or for any voter, or to or for any person on behalf of any voter, or to or for any person in order to induce or have such person induce any voter to vote for or refrain from voting for, or support or oppose any candidate, or on account of such voter having voted or refrained from voting at any primary election in this State; every person who by any means receives, agrees, or contracts for any money, gift, * * * or for inducing, or undertaking to induce any other person to vote in a particular manner, or to do or perform any of the acts or things forbidden by this act, or on account of agreeing to do, or having done any campaign work, electioneering, soliciting votes for such candidate on primary day or prior thereto, or who after any primary election in this State, directly or indirectly, by himself or by any other person in his behalf, gives or receives any money or valuable consideration or place, position, or employment on account of any person having voted or refrained from voting, or having induced any other person to vote or refrain from voting at any such primary election; or having induced or undertaken to induce any other person to vote in a particular manner or for any particular candidate at any such primary election, or on account of any person having done or been a party to doing anything forbidden by this act, it being the intent of this clause to prohibit the prevailing practice of candidates hiring with money and promises of positions, etc., workers on primary day and prior thereto, * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, etc.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, we have heard a good deal of discussion under the law about section 45. That is, perhaps, the most important section with which we have to deal. It provides in its closing language—and that is all I shall now refer to—or having induced any other person to vote or refrain from voting at any such primary election; or having induced or undertaken to induce any other person to vote in a particular manner or for any particular candidate at any such primary election, or on account of any person having done or been a party to doing anything forbidden by this act, it being the intent of this clause to prohibit the prevailing practice of candidates hiring with money and promises of positions, etc., workers on primary day and prior thereto.

There has been considerable controversy about that. I have so much respect for my good friend from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and for his legal opinion that I do not like to differ from him. He took the position, as I understood him, that that meant bribery; that some one had to go out and bribe somebody else. Either Mr. Newberry's committee violated that law or they did not. It seems to me perfectly plain that it related to workers at the primary or before the primary. Now, let us see. I quote from section 45:

It being the intent of this clause to prohibit the prevailing practice of candidates hiring with money and promises of positions.

Was it the "prevailing practice" of candidates in Michigan to bribe? No. The prevailing practice, of course, was to send out workers to cultivate influence; that is what the statute struck at. I do not think the Senator from Missouri would claim that in the great and splendid State of Michigan it was the "prevailing practice" to bribe men at elections. That is the section which has been violated over and over again in this case, as the evidence shows.

Now, granting for the sake of the argument that the so-called voluntary committee was a voluntary committee and that Mr. Newberry had nothing to do with their actions, yet if it is shown that they have violated the laws of Michigan in hiring workers and that such violation brought about his election, he would not be entitled to his seat, even though he knew absolutely nothing about it. In other words, friends or relatives could not step in and buy a senatorial seat for a man and give it to him as a present. If so, the Standard Oil Co., the Steel Corporation, or other great financial institutions could say to a man, "We will take care of you; you can go to Europe; you will know nothing about it; we will buy the seat and present it to you." He could hold up his hands in holy horror when he hears about it after the election and still retain his seat. That can not be done.

In the Clark case in this body there were a number of citations and considerable discussion relating to this point, but I think I will not take the time of the Senate to go into that now.

That is about all I wish to say concerning the law. I have tried to elucidate these three points: That there could be such tremendous sums of money spent as to shock public conscience and to vitiate an election, even though the expenditure did not violate any statute at all; second, that the Federal statute was violated in this case, although there can be no criminal conviction because the statute has been declared unconstitutional; and, third, that the statutes of Michigan have been violated.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. SPENCER. Will the Senator be good enough to tell me, under his interpretation of section 3845 of the statute which he has just quoted, if I were a resident of Michigan and on the day before the primary I were to say to some boy, "Will you take these cards and distribute them in your neighborhood, and here is a dollar for doing it," and those cards had to do with the advocacy of the election of a friend of mine, whether he would consider that law as making me a criminal for that act?

Mr. KENYON. No.

Mr. SPENCER. Then, the Senator agrees with me?

Mr. KENYON. No; I do not agree with the Senator. I do not think we will ever agree on that probably, although I wish we could, for we can agree on almost everything else. We will say the Senator goes into a building in Detroit and asks his friends to vote for somebody; that is not a crime; but if the Senator is employed as a worker to go out and do that, then, I say, it is a crime. If the Senator makes one of his splendid speeches, and he is not hired or employed to do it, it is not a crime; but if he were employed to go out and make speeches for pay, under the Michigan statute it would be a crime. Does not the Senator get my position? I think I get his.

Mr. SPENCER. I think I do; but I think the Senator from Iowa is mistaken, because the making of speeches, as a matter of fact, even for hire, as I recall, is one of the 11 excepted things which may be done.

Mr. KENYON. Suppose it was not one of the 11 exceptions—and this gets us down to the point—then, to make a speech for hire would be a crime, while to make it without hire would not be a crime, under the Michigan law. I think it is one of the exceptions, so my comparison may not be entirely apt.

Mr. SPENCER. The illustration I submitted to the distinguished Senator from Iowa had to do with hiring, and not to a voluntary act. The question was if I should go to a boy, offering him a pecuniary consideration, and say to him, "I want to hire you this afternoon to distribute these cards up and down your block advocating the election of my friend," would I be a criminal under the Senator's interpretation of the Michigan law for doing that?

Mr. KENYON. If the boy were employed as a worker, it would be a crime.

Mr. SPENCER. He would be a worker when he distributed the cards.

Mr. KENYON. If he were a worker for Newberry, it would be a crime, but if he were merely to go and give out advertisements I do not think it would be.

Mr. SPENCER. Does the Senator mean that if he were a worker for Ford it would not be a crime?

Mr. KENYON. No.

Mr. SPENCER. Of course, I am sure the Senator did not mean that.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator can not bring up the Ford smoke screen in this connection, so far as I am concerned, but I will have something to say about Ford before I get through.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. It is all right; but I fear the Senator and I are never going to agree, because I have stated the proposition and the Senator does not agree with me as to the law, although I am firm in the belief that my contention is right. If I cited a thousand cases, I do not think that I could make it any plainer.

Mr. SPENCER. I understand the Senator to say if I hire a boy or a man to distribute cards for a certain candidate in the State of Michigan that, in his judgment, I am violating the statute of Michigan and am a criminal under the law.

Mr. KENYON. I say that if the boy is merely distributing cards it is not a violation of the law.

Mr. SPENCER. But suppose I hire him—suppose he is being employed for hire.

Mr. KENYON. If the boy is going out for the purpose of influencing others through his actions, then I think it is in violation of the statute.

Mr. SPENCER. He is going out to influence people so far as the distribution of cards will influence them. In that case am I a criminal under the laws of Michigan in hiring that boy?

Mr. KENYON. Under the statute of Michigan if the Senator employed some one to go out to influence people, he would violate the law. My answer to that is found in the case from Missouri, which, whenever the Senator makes that argument, we like to refer to. The Missouri statute reads in part:

> If any person * * * shall, by himself or any other, procure, or endeavor to procure, the election of any person to any office.

What does the court in the Senator's State say about that? They draw a distinction, a clear distinction, between the character of the service which is purchased. The court says—and I am reading from the case of Keating against Hyde, in Twenty-third Missouri Appeal Reports—

> There is a clear distinction between the purchase of services to be devoted only to an advertising of the fact that one is, or desires to be, a candidate, and the purchase of service to be employed in advocating his peculiar merits and eligibility, so as to influence the choice of the voter.

That is the point, and the Missouri case makes it clear.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. Inasmuch as the question of hiring has taken so prominent a place in this discussion, does the Senator from Missouri contend that if Mr. Newberry or his responsible agents had employed a worker to be at each voting place in the State on the day of the primary, paying him, we will say, $50 a day to go there and to get in touch with the voters and to advocate the election of Mr. Newberry, that would not come within the statute?

Mr. SPENCER. I do not. It would come within the statute probably in a double sense. It would come within the statute, first, because it would exceed the amount which Mr. Newberry as a candidate is allowed to expend, namely, $3,750, in the entire State. Therefore, if he had one worker at $50 a day, which, of course, is probably a fanciful assumption——

Mr. BORAH. I referred to it because that is the amount which was paid in some instances.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator will not find in the testimony that $50 a day was paid.

Mr. KENYON. Fifty dollars was left under a book.

Mr. SPENCER. He can find it only in his imagination. There was not a single worker who received anything like that amount or even a substantial fraction of it.

Mr. BORAH. I remember differently, but we will leave that to the record.

Mr. SPENCER. The amount would far exceed what he was allowed personally to expend under the law of Michigan. More than that, there is also a statute which prohibits soliciting or influencing voters near the polling places. If, however, the Senator by his question means to inquire whether under the law of Michigan if the friends of the candidate, independent of himself, want to have men employed for the purpose of disseminating information or cards, or bringing voters to the polls on election day, such activities would be criminal, I answer that they would not constitute crimes under the laws of Michigan any more than they would in Missouri or, I assume, in Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Idaho will put the question again, because the Senator from Missouri discusses a question which the Senator from Idaho did not intend to submit, and it is because, perhaps, he did not make himself plain. Suppose, however, I say that Mr. Newberry or an agent for whom he was responsible actually employs a man at so much per day to be at the voting places upon the day of the election to work for him, to advocate his cause. Is that within the statute of the State of Michigan as it has been read by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SPENCER. I should say advocating his cause at the polls, at least in Missouri, would be objectionable. In that State one can not advocate the election of a candidate at the polls, and I assume that the law of Michigan is the same; but that does not come under the section quoted by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. The statute relates to the employment of workers. Suppose they employed half the voters of the State of Michigan to go out and work, would that be a violation of the law?

Mr. SPENCER. Of course. Any perfectly legal and proper thing carried to an undue extent may become illegal by the very extent to which it is carried. One may make any kind of assumption, such as the one the Senator has made; but if it were possible to get 51 per cent of the voters to act as workers on election day, that, of course, would be a violation of some law or against good policy.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose the statute of Michigan was designed to prohibit the employment of men for compensation, for money, to work on the day of election.

Mr. SPENCER. Or before.

Mr. BORAH. I am now confining it to the day of the election in order that we may have a concrete, simple proposition. There has grown up in the country, throughout all the States, the custom that a man who has the ability to do so can employ men to work for him for money's sake, not because they may necessarily believe in him as a candidate or because they may think he would make a good candidate, but because he is willing to pay them so much that they will go out and work for him. The statute was designed, as I understand it, to prohibit that kind of employment.

Mr. KENYON. It was designed to prohibit the prevailing practices. Every Senator knows just what the Senator from Idaho has said, that in elections they will employ a dozen or 20 men to go out and work for somebody in every ward. You have bought those men. That is all there is to it. That is the influence. That is the prevailing practice that they are trying to get away from, so that men of great wealth can not employ men to go out and work for them. The very fact that they get them in their employ is by the use of money. Otherwise this statute does not mean much of anything.

Now we pass to the evidence.

The evidence has been so thoroughly reviewed by the Senators from Ohio, Montana, and Missouri that I think probably I ought not to take very much time on it; but I shall take some.

Most of the time there have been but few Senators in the Chamber. I realize that there is no use in discussing the evidence; that if the record showed the expenditure of a million dollars for Mr. Newberry, Senators would still refuse to listen. I venture the assertion that very few Senators on this side of the Chamber have read even the briefs, to say nothing of the record, nor will they do so. They are determined that Mr. Newberry shall retain his seat. I apprehend that some Senators in this body who voted against Mr. Stephenson—where there was an expenditure of only $107,000, which at that time shocked the public conscience—will be found here voting to retain Mr. Newberry. I think the American people will watch that record with some interest; but I give my own conviction that no one with open mind who will divorce himself from friendship for Mr. Newberry and forget for the time that he is a member of any political party can calmly and judicially review this evidence and not arrive at the conclusion that the statutes of Michigan were flagrantly violated; that such sums of money were spent in hiring workers and in the publicity campaign as to shock the public conscience; and that the election is absolutely tainted at its source—and when I say "election," I of course include the primary as part of the election or as an agency of election, as it necessarily is.

I know, however, that this will not be done. Senators are going to rely on the majority report. They are going to rely on the oft-repeated statements of the Senator from Missouri that Mr. Newberry knew nothing about it. They are going to do so because they have great affection for Mr. Newberry, because he is a good fellow, was a patriotic citizen during the war, and was a member of the Roosevelt Cabinet, which is in itself a great distinction and honor.

The social lobby has been active in this case, more active than in most matters; and the social lobby is becoming very effective in Washington. No argument is going to change any votes. The matter is pushed at a time when the country can know but little about it; but the time will come when the country will know about it. If Mr. Newberry were a Democrat I have no doubt he would be voted out of this body promptly under this record. At the same time we would find some of our Democratic friends stoutly defending him. In other words, there is politics in this. It is unfortunate that any question of public morality, public conscience, or purity of elections should find a dividing line of politics in this Chamber. But apparently you can not divorce these matters from politics, and some men now are seeking to make this a test of Republicanism.

I deny that the Newberry case is any test of Republicanism. I deny that the 7,000,000 majority of the Republican Party last fall was a vindication of any such methods. While there will be few Republican votes against Mr. Newberry, I believe these votes will better represent the sentiment of the Republicans of the Nation than the votes here cast for him. The Republican Party can not carry a burden of this kind. I deny the right of a few men in this body to determine what are tests of Republicanism. I hope the day will never come when "Lorimerism" and "Stephensonism" and "Newberryism" will be a test of Republicanism, and I do not think the day has arrived when a few gentlemen in the Senate of the United States can determine what Republicanism is. If so, God save the Republican Party!

In some respects this case is worse than the Lorimer case. There was some courage there. They went out and bought the election. It is infinitely worse than the Stephenson case, where a poor old man with a large fortune, in old age, almost in his dotage, was flattered into expending his money to become a Member of this body. In this case Mr. Newberry, a man of the highest intelligence and culture, had been a member of a great Cabinet. The personnel is different.

I assert that, under the record, the following conclusions can reasonably, safely, and legitimately be drawn:

That the committee expended approximately $263,000.

That the committee violated the Federal statute and the statutes of Michigan, and that such action entered into the election through the primary.

That the committee was not a voluntary committee. It was picked by Mr. Newberry.

That Mr. Newberry was responsible for the acts of the committee, and that the agency of Cody and King is established beyond question, and he would be responsible in a civil action for debts contracted by them in the campaign.

That Mr. Newberry knew about the campaign, financially and otherwise, and knew of most of the expenditures of the campaign.

That a part of the money spent in the campaign was actually the money of Mr. Newberry.

I appeal to this record to sustain every one of those propositions.

Mr. President, in different parts of the material which I have prepared I have made references to different parts of the testimony; and I want to say here now that where the letters "B. E." are used they refer to the bill of exceptions, made part of the record in this case, and where the letter "R." is used it refers to the record outside of the bill of exceptions.

The committee was not a voluntary committee. This has been discussed by others to such an extent that I hesitate to spend any time on it. Mr. Templeton, general chairman, was associated with Mr. Newberry in business. He had seen him in New York. He had talked over his being a candidate. He was solicited by Mr. Newberry to become a member of the citizens' committee or a business men's committee. He agreed. He was in no sense a volunteer. He claims he was a mere figurehead. Paul King, executive chairman, controlling spirit, was solicited by Mr. Templeton and Mr. Cody to take the position. Templeton telegraphed to Newberry urging him to appoint King and fixing the time of meeting for King and Newberry in New York. (B. E., 556.) The telegram is as follows:

GOVERNMENT'S EXHIBIT 123.

(Western Union telegram.)

DETROIT, MICH., 13.

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Hotel Gotham, New York, N. Y.:

Have spent past two days in conference with Cody men from out in the State and city. Everyone thinks, including Frank Blair, that Paul King quite necessary. King will be in New York Saturday and Sunday this week; Mr. Blair next week. Report satisfactory progress.

A. A. TEMPLETON.

This telegram refers to Cody men out in the State thinking that King was necessary. Who were the Cody men out in the State? How did there happen to be Cody men around the State? King went to New York, talked over the campaign with Newberry, and talked about what it would cost. He accepted the job, which had previously been tendered to Mr. Hayden. Was King a volunteer? Cody, who is referred to as the messenger boy in the brief of counsel for Mr. Newberry, went to Washington to see Hayden. He is the same Cody concerning whom Newberry wrote to Miller that he was down to see him on confidential matters. Here is the letter (B. E., p. 640):

DEFENDANT'S EXHIBIT 48.

OFFICE OF THE COMMANDANT,
THIRD NAVAL DISTRICT,
280 Broadway, New York City, December 18, 1917.

[Personal.]

MY DEAR GEORGE: I am sure you will realize that my duty here absolutely prevents my getting to Washington, and as I can not see you in person I am asking Mr. Fred Cody, who is going down to Washington, to have a talk with you on some confidential matters, and I am hoping that you have not as yet gone home on your Christmas vacation, so that you will arrange to meet him.

With kind regards, and wishing you all the compliments of the season,

Sincerely, yours, TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY.

Cody was present at nearly everything that went on except the hearings of the Senate committee. Cody goes to Michigan, and seems to have organized Cody men out in the State. It is the same Cody who tells about the "lid being off," and that "the boys would have a big time" in Michigan. No one can claim that Cody was a volunteer. Cody was an agent; and the letter of Newberry to Miller down here at Washington, when he sent Cody here, shows that he was not only an agent but he was a confidential agent. Blair, the treasurer of the committee, was president of the trust company in Detroit of which Mr. Newberry was a large stockholder. Templeton requested him to become treasurer of the committee, which he did. What kind of a volunteer was he? Mr. Floyd afterwards, as the record shows, was given a fine position. There was no volunteering there. These, with Emery, were the men who were carrying on this campaign.

What a farce to talk about this being a voluntary committee! Patriotic citizens, feeling that the welfare of the Nation and its perpetuity demanded the defeat of Henry Ford, we are told, formed this voluntary committee! That is what we are told, when the fact is that there was not a volunteer on that committee.

It is argued here that this is a voluntary committee to get rid of the question of agency. It is a subterfuge so to claim. I assert as a matter of law under this record that if King and Cody had contracted bills in this campaign a recovery could be had at the hands of Mr. Newberry. A person can not turn an agent loose with absolute authority to do certain things and not be responsible for his actions within the scope of the agency; and what they did in this campaign under the law of agency Newberry did.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just there?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator will recall that when the campaign was ended Mr. Newberry indorsed what King had done, because he thanked him and said he was under obligations to him for it.

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. President, it would take hours to go over this great mass of evidence of workers violating the statutes, and I am not going to do it. I am going to refer to just a few of them, showing knowledge upon the part of Mr. Newberry of this whole thing.

Why try to jam down the throats of intelligent people the oft-repeated assertions that Newberry knew nothing about this? It is an insult to Newberry. If a man can have a campaign going on like that campaign in Michigan and not know anything about the financial end of it, he ought not to come to Washington and be a Senator. Something will be put over on him. Michigan needs a man here, as it has in Senator TOWNSEND, who will look after things and know what is going on; but a man who does not know anything about a campaign like this, managed and financed as this one was, one of the most bitterly contested campaigns in the history of the country, ought to be protected from being around Washington.

In the King letter of May 30, 1918, he said:

Of course, we could find people in these counties to take up the work, but in many cases they would be lesser lights and we want to get the principal workers, if possible.

Not boys to pass around cards, but workers. King was an adept at this matter.

Mr. Angus McEachron testified that he was employed to talk with the traveling men, not at their meetings but in their anteroom, and wherever else he could find them. He said:

My work consisted of just talking to the traveling men; nothing else.

He was talking to them, influencing them, about Newberry. Was that a violation of the Michigan statute?

Another witness was Mr. Allan K. Moore. Whenever he paid out sums of money, he reported to Mr. Charles Floyd. He testified:

My object in going there was to call on the men of more or less prominence that I knew particularly, and advertise Mr. Newberry's campaign.

If that was all he did, simply advertising the campaign, I do not think that was a violation of the law, but if he was around working, using his influence, to influence men, that was a violation of the law.

Mr. William M. Connelly was a State senator. Floyd asked him to take on the Newberry campaign. He was running for senator. He received $1,200 from Floyd, hired men to distribute literature, and he made speeches and was paid for making speeches. That is certainly a violation of the law of Michigan. It is bad enough to have to listen to some of these speeches, without having to pay the man to make them. Floyd told him to make up an expense account of something less than $200. He had received $1,200. Floyd, one of the agents, told him to make up an expense account showing less than $200.

We have the testimony of the prosecuting attorney of Wexford County, who got a check for $100, went to Cadillac, caused petitions to be circulated for the nomination of Mr. Newberry, "and enlisted the support of my friends for Mr. Newberry." If that was all he did, if he merely passed around petitions, it would not be a violation of the law.

We are asked here with great rhetorical flourish why there have not been some prosecutions in Michigan for violating this Michigan law. Some of these checks to prosecuting attorneys may explain it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Would it interrupt the Senator if I asked him a question?

Mr. KENYON. Not at all.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did the Senator read the statement of the man who was formerly mayor of Flint, under indictment and conviction for assault to commit a robbery, sentenced to from 2 to 15 years, that King and others came and told him that he could either go to jail or support Newberry? Fletcher said, "You know, I am powerful at Lansing, and I shall be even after the primary, whether Newberry wins or loses."

Mr. KENYON. I thought I had read all the evidence, but I do not remember that.

Mr. CARAWAY. In the beginning of the conversation, he said, he told them positively that he would not support Newberry, and King wanted to know how much it would cost, and he said, "I am not for him at all," and Fletcher said, "I told you before we came in here that you need not talk money to this man. Let me talk to him. I have done business with him before, and I can again." He said, "I don't want you to tell me"—this is Fletcher talking to the man who has been convicted—"I don't want you to tell me what you are going to do. I know you can control this district. If it goes for Mr. Newberry, we will know where you stood. If it goes against him, we will know where you stand, and you can do one of the two things, you can go to jail or support Mr. Newberry." The man then said that he went on the outside and talked to the boys and said, "You don't know how they put it up to me. I don't care whether Newberry is elected or not, but I expect he had better get some good votes here," and he adds, "The district went for Newberry, and my case was reversed."

King denied that, but Fletcher and two other men supporting Newberry, who went there with him, have never from that day to this opened their mouths to say that that conversation did not occur, and that that bargain was not struck.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. Field, manager of the Hotel Chippewa at Manistee, testified that Floyd asked him to give a hundred dollars to Richard Hoffman, county road commissioner, "for to work in the interest of Newberry." He further testified:

With regard to Mr. Hoffman, we agreed that we thought that, being county road commissioner, he could do a lot of good work for Newberry's campaign, on account of being around the county so much.

Was he simply employed to put out cards, or was it buying the Hoffman influence?

There is in the record the testimony of a Polish lawyer, sent out among the Polish citizens to organize them. He organized the Polish voters in Michigan for Mr. Newberry.

Charles Tufts, of Scottsville, Mich., testified:

He told me he (Paul King) was anxious to see Mr. Newberry win out and requested that I work for him, and I discussed with him plans for my work in behalf of Mr. Newberry, and suggested that I travel over a part of the State.

Was that a hiring under the statute?

I do not intend to put many of these in the RECORD. If Senators would read them they would find them interesting. But here is the testimony of Mr. Bohn, who made the Newberry campaign in Luce County, who received $150. Listen to what he said:

I expended, further, $125 for workers distributing literature and getting the vote out. Also had a list of voters in the townships made, which I used. I employed about 15 men to work primary day and paid them $5 apiece, two of them $10, who worked before primary day.

Does anyone doubt that this was going on all over the State? Was that a violation of the law of Michigan? Mr. Maddigan seemed to be a very interesting gentleman. He was chief inspector of plant 35, Buick Motor Co., Flint. That gentleman was told he would not be expected to devote his time for nothing, and the gentleman coming from the campaign committee asked him what he would accept. This is his testimony:

He asked me what I would expect if I would swing my support to Newberry. I told him I thought it was worth $150. * * * So then he told me he would expect I would devote all my spare time from that time on until after the primaries, and I told him if I had to do that, I wouldn't do it for $150—I would have to get more than it. While he said he would not let that stop it, that if I went out and devoted my time, I would get twice that amount; he didn't just use them words, but it was taken for granted that I was to get twice $150, that is the way I took it. He gave me $15 that evening. * * * He told me that there would be some petitions out and wanted to know how many signers I could get. I told him between 700 and 1,000 throughout the factories.

Of course, if he just passed around petitions in the factories, that would not be a violation of the law; but his support was purchased. Can there be any more corrupting influence than that? Can there be any clearer violation of the statute?

So it goes with many others, to whom I am not going to take the time to refer.

No man could stand in any court of law under this evidence and contend that the Newberry committee had not violated the statute. They could spend money for advertising, and for ten other purposes, but hiring workers is not one of the purposes for which an exception was made. It is the very thing the statute seeks to avoid. They would be driven to contend, as the majority here contend, that Mr. Newberry knew nothing about it, and it does seem to me, in making that statement, the majority insult the intelligence of the Senate; they insult the intelligence of Mr. Newberry himself, and rely on the fact that the Senate will not read the record, but will simply take their statements. It is the only position that can be taken, and they are driven at every turn of the road to take that position, and when the Senator from Missouri is unable to answer the questions propounded to him on the floor, he announces with great oratorical effect and beautiful rhetoric that Mr. Newberry was in New York and knew nothing about it. It is amazing that a man who had been Secretary of the Navy and active in business affairs could have a great campaign going on like this, one that everyone else knew about, and that he knew nothing about it, even though his attention was called in letters from Vandenberg and others to the enormous expenditures.

Mr. Vandenburg, in his letter to Mr. Newberry of August 15, said, in part:

The time to meet trouble is when and where it breeds. Michigan Republicanism has headed for the rocks more than once during the past 20 years as a result of the overgenerosity of candidates and their "friends" and "committees" who have deemed it proper to write political checks abundantly. Such a menace must not recur; and since an unchallenged reputation for such practices is almost as fatal as the practices themselves, I urge a reply from you immediately.

He got a reply to that, which I may as well read now, because I think this reply of Mr. Templeton and Mr. King discloses the real, honest purpose of this campaign, and if this case had been brought in here on the theory they disclosed in their letter I should have had a very different view of the situation. They say:

The attention of the Nation is fixed upon Michigan at this time, and what is done here will have a marked effect upon the country as a whole. With the well-known developments in the campaign, our mission has lost its personal characteristics. We are no longer standing for an individual, but contending for the principles which he represents. Any amount of effort to maintain these principles is not only commendable but imperatively necessary, and any group of citizens who will give of their time, effort, and money to sustain them are performing a patriotic duty.

Mr. Templeton was bold. He evidently believed that the expenditure of any amount of money was justifiable to defeat Henry Ford for the Senate, and he is perfectly honest in saying so. I am going to refer to that in a moment.

The majority say in their report that—

Truman H. Newberry was absent from the State of Michigan continuously during the entire campaign and until long after the election had been held. He took no part whatever either in the financial or other features of the primary campaign or its direction or control.

I can not understand how the majority of the committee could arrive at any such conclusion when the entire record is full of evidence to show that while Mr. Newberry was absent from the State in person, he was present in spirit, and that he absolutely directed the campaign. His managers went to New York to see him. Every day, or practically every day, he had a report from Mr. King. They were in communication by telephone and by telegraph.

The attorney for Mr. Newberry before the committee stated practically that Mr. Newberry knew all about the campaign. He directed even to the extent of how postage stamps should be placed upon envelopes. He speaks in one letter to King of scaring Mr. Warner out and keeping up "our publicity work at full pressure."

The publicity cost, according to the record, $140,000. I quote from his letter to Mr. King dated April 13, 1918:

I am glad Mr. Warner is scared out for the present, and as long as we keep up our publicity work at full pressure it will be harder and harder for any new man to get any kind of a start that will make it seem worth while for him to be a serious candidate.

Yet it is contended he did not know all about the campaign. That was dated April 13, before Henry Ford had gone into the race as a candidate at all.

Thousands upon thousands of letters were signed by him to go out in the campaign. They were sent to New York and signed by him. Every man who signed the petition for his nomination received a personal letter from him. Movie-picture shows were devised and exhibited over the State, certainly with the knowledge and full understanding of Mr. Newberry.

I do not join in the fun that has been poked at Mr. Newberry's posing on that battleship. Candidates in a campaign are often forced by friends to do things which may appear very foolish afterwards.

The members of this committee were the agents of Mr. Newberry, and he is responsible for whatever they did along the line of their duty.

The Davidson incident in the northern peninsula is indicative of how the campaign was conducted. I read from the report of the minority:

Mr. King and Mr. Newberry planned together to win Davidson from Gov. Osborn or to neutralize his influence, and finally Mr. Newberry wrote to Mr. King under date of May 2, 1918:

"* * * I think it necessary that I should have more detailed information concerning Mr. Davidson and his exact connection with the United States Steel Co. before I undertake to talk to any of my friends here who are in intimate touch with that organization. You may be sure that I shall leave nothing undone to accomplish the desired result in this matter." (B. E., 709.)

No accurate knowledge of what was going on! Taking up the effect of Davidson in the northern peninsula through friends with the officers of the United States Steel Co.! As the minority report states (p. 13):

Mr. Newberry was dealing with influential elements in New York. He was interesting Mr. John Mitchell, the great labor leader, in his campaign. (B. E., 689.) He conferred with the Steel Trust officers. (B. E., 709, 774.) He was dealing with the big mining company bosses (B. E., 698), and he was reporting all of his activities to the Newberry senatorial campaign committee, of which Mr. Templeton was the general chairman and Mr. King was the executive chairman. Strange, was it not, that all of their activities should so dovetail together?

Now, I wish to refer briefly to some of the mountain peaks of evidence on the question of knowledge. On March 8, 1918, the following letter was written by Newberry to King:

Regardless of what Mr. Warren's decision in the matter is I shall hope and expect my friends to continue their work in my behalf until after the primary polls have closed. Under no circumstances that I can foresee would I retire in Mr. Warren's favor, so please strongly express to any inquiring friends what I have said above.

He had a right, of course, to go into the campaign. Every man has the right to aspire to a senatorship. Why now try to convince people that he did not know anything about it?

Again, in his letter to King of April 14:

I will continue in the race to the finish.

In the letter of April 13 to King he said:

I am glad Mr. Warner is scared off for the present, and as long as we keep up our publicity work at full pressure—

To which I have referred before, and the publicity work cost $140,000.

In his letter of July 4, 1918, to King he said:

I feel sure that William Alden—

I suppose that is our old friend William Alden Smith—will declare himself in his oration to-day, but I can not get very excited about it as his main strength will come from that part of the community which is swayed by oratory.

Some of the strength in the Newberry campaign was not swayed by oratory. They could not touch that part, because William Alden had a monopoly on oratory.

Again, on August 9, in another letter to Paul King, he said:

There is much more information about Osborn's present plight I will tell you when I see you. The statement that he is short of ammunition is an absolute fact. * * * I am inclosing a copy of my noncommittal reply to the Grand Rapids people, which covers the situation in a rather flimsy manner.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENYON. If the Senator from Arizona does not wish to propose an amendment to anything, I will yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I am just going to comment on the fact that the sitting Member says, and his associates say, that he knew nothing about his own candidacy and his own financial situation, but apparently he was well advised as to the financial situation of his opponent.

Mr. CARAWAY. May I interrupt the Senator just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. On August 11 the sitting Member, Mr. Newberry, wrote a letter to Vandenberg, who had written him about the character of campaign that was being conducted in his behalf in Michigan and told him how scandalous and corrupt it was. Newberry wrote him a letter, in which he said, "I am informed that the committee"—that is, the Newberry senatorial committee—"can file its account and justify its expenditures." Three days later, on the 14th of August, he swore there was nothing spent in his behalf with his knowledge or consent.

On the 11th he wrote that he was informed that these expenditures were legal and could be justified. If he did not have that information, of course, he was joking. If he did have it when he swore three days later that he knew nothing about it, I leave it to the Senator to decide for himself what he swore. But on the 11th he did solemnly assure these men who were inquiring from him that these expenditures could be justified. If he did not know, he ought to have said so; and if he did know, he ought not to have sworn that he did not know.

Mr. KENYON. The majority stated in their opinion that the evidence shows conclusively that the financial cost of the campaign was voluntarily borne by relatives and friends of Truman H. Newberry and was entirely without solicitation or knowledge upon his part.

I have referred before to the fact that when King visited Newberry they talked about the cost, and that it would cost at least $50,000. Now, does anybody believe, knowing Mr. Newberry as we know him—generous, kindhearted man—that he would have sat back in a campaign and contributed absolutely nothing, where he had been advised it was going to cost $50,000; that he would let his friends do the whole thing? He is a man of means, and his family have means. That is a rather amazing proposition, that we would permit his friends to do the entire financing of the campaign.

We have the amazing testimony of John S. Newberry that he wanted to finance the campaign. Smith had his power of attorney. John S. Newberry had no conversation with his brother. Think of it. A man running for the Senate and his brother never talking it over with him, but financing him; never had any conversation with Templeton, King, or Cody, or Blair; never inquired what was being done with the money; did not care how much was expended; never talked to anybody but Mr. Smith—and that was merely that he wanted to finance it; only knew by the papers that his brother was going to run.

Bear in mind this was after Cody had been sent to Washington to see Hayden and after King had agreed to act as manager. Amazing testimony! We are asked to assume that all the statements of John S. Newberry are correct. If John S. Newberry had said the moon was made of green cheese my good friend from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] would have insisted we must accept it in our heart and conscience because Truman Newberry was in New York and knew nothing about the construction of the moon. This is all very strange, especially when coupled with the testimony of Smith and the power of attorney.

I can excuse the testimony of John S. Newberry. I would lie to save my brother or my family. Almost anyone else with any red blood would, too. I would not believe the testimony. It is a good deal like that little incident in Les Miserables where that poor convict Jean Valjean pursued by Javert year in and year out finally rushed into the room of Sister Simplice in an attempt to escape. Javert appeared at the door. Out went the light. Jean Valjean hid in the room and the sister knelt in prayer. Even that bully had some respect for prayer. He asked the sister if she was alone in the room, and looking up from her prayer she said, "Yes." He asked her if Jean Valjean had passed through the room, and looking up from her prayer she said, "No." Two lies, but Hugo goes on to picture how the recording angel, looking down on that scene, would blot out those lies with his tears.

That is the way I look at the John S. Newberry testimony. The brother was in trouble, deep trouble. A man will lie for his brother when he is in trouble. I respect him for doing it. A lie may be sometimes justifiable in this world.

Here was a man, Smith, the agent of the Newberrys, managing several funds, with a power of attorney. Here was the man told by John S. Newberry to use any amount of money. Here was the man in close association with King, who had stated that he could do anything he pleased, that anything he saw that needed to be done he did it. He knew there were unlimited funds behind him. So the truth is that Smith could take any amount of money—if this is not so I would like to know it under the record—from the account of Truman H. Newberry and put it into the account of John S. Newberry and vice versa. Who was it complained about the balances? Not John S. Newberry. He did not care. He did not care how much money they spent. He was not going to lose.

But little is said here about the telegram from Smith to Newberry of July 28, 1918. That is the most important testimony in the whole case to connect Newberry with knowledge of the expenditure of money, and here it is:

Detroit, Mich., July 28, 1918.

Addressed to Lieut. Truman H. Newberry, third naval district, New York, as follows:

I misinformed you this morning the date of closing of regular expenses.

Why were they talking about it over the phone beforehand?

Should have said August 27. Circular work, advertising, clerical help, postage, and all regular overhead expenses will naturally continue until primary. Have written. Fred P. Smith.

Read that and then tell anybody that he did not know about the expenses of this campaign.

King, manager, on cross-examination, pressed as to the knowledge of Mr. Newberry of expenditures, said:

Of course he knew. Every sane man would know that large sums of money were being expended.

In this connection I desire to refer to a letter from Newberry to Miller, of the Detroit News, of April 6, as follows—a part only is necessary:

Neither Mr. Templeton, Mr. King, nor Mr. Oakman have ever or expect ever to receive one cent (except actual travel and publicity costs) from me. They have not suggested such a thing.

Mr. Cody and Mr. Templeton were the ones present at the meeting at the Statler Hotel with King in February, and King was then told the money would be furnished by friends and business associates of Mr. Newberry. King thought Templeton said that. Templeton said he did not, though he does say that if King says he did he must have done so; but in the record, at page 415, he said he did not say it. Cody was the only remaining man to tell King that this would be financed by friends and business associates of Mr. Newberry. Who told Cody the campaign would be financed by those friends and business associates? Not John S. Newberry, for his conversations as to money were around April 1, and the meeting at the Statler Hotel was in February. Further, he said he never talked to anyone except Smith, not even his brother, so Cody did not get the information from John S. Newberry.

This messenger boy, Cody, was a close friend of Newberry, the one who was sent confidentially to see Miller at Washington, the one who announced they would spend a barrel of money, the one who announced to Swinehart in New York that he had been out to Michigan and the lid was off and that the sky was the limit.

Where did Cody get his information? Who was it talked about money at the first meeting in New York when Newberry, Cody, and King were present?

The majority say further in their report that "the amount spent at the primary was large—too large—but there was no concealment whatever with regard to it, and it was spent entirely for legal and proper purposes"—page 7, majority report.

It is amazing that the committee can make this statement. The brief for Mr. Newberry says the amount spent was not unreasonable. Was it a proper or legal purpose to spend money to employ workers at and before the primary? Was it done? Nearly 100 of these political workers testified at the Grand Rapids trial under oath as to the payment of money. The record is full of evidence, as I have called attention, of the amounts of money paid to secure the influence of workers in all parts of the State in absolute defiance of the Michigan statute.

Of course, as I said before, if the evidence is to be eliminated from men's minds merely because Mr. Newberry is a Republican, and that no Republican has the right to question his election and still remain a good Republican, then I can understand how the committee's report can be sustained. It is an insult to the Republican Party to claim that a vote on this question is a test of Republicanism. It is an insult to the millions of Republicans throughout the country to maintain that the majority in this body must be maintained through corrupt elections. It is false, fallacious, and detrimental to the party. The people of the country have a right to inquire as to the proposition of fixing a price on seats in this body.

The question is not alone a question of Mr. Newberry. If the doctrine is to be established that any amount of money can be spent to secure a seat here, what is going to be the result? I am wondering what will happen to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] next year when the packer pocketbook is opened for unlimited use against him.

I hope there are some statutes in his State to save the situation. I am wondering what will happen to the splendid Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] when the liquor interests of the country open up their limitless funds in an insidious campaign against him; when men travel around his State, working in lodges and unions, securing labor papers, brotherhoods and secret societies, influencing everybody and everything except Sunday school picnics. I am wondering what will happen to the Senator from South Dakota—and he will never know just how it happened.

There is enough disrespect for law in this country without having the Senate help it on. If there is any danger in this Nation to-day, it is the growing disrespect for law, and here the highest legislative body in the world is asked to put its sanction upon the violation of law and the expenditure of $263,000 to secure a seat in this body.

In the national campaign last year the friends of certain gentlemen started out to secure the Republican presidential nomination for them—I will not say to buy the nomination, because there were some Senators who helped to manage certain campaigns, but to use money for influence it could secure.

The friends of one candidate expended over a million dollars; another expended one-half of that amount; and before our committee investigating campaign expenditures we had two precious scoundrels of the Missouri delegation who were for Lowden for President and who had $2,500 apiece of Lowden money in their pockets or in the bank. They did not seem to see anything unusual or strange about that. They sat there with brazen effrontery and bland countenances; they had violated no statute.

The Republicans did not dare to nominate either Gen. Wood or Gov. Lowden, because of the enormous expenditures in their campaigns. Senator Harding was nominated, and one of the great contributing causes was the clean account sheet that he had in his campaign. Everything he spent was put before the committee by Mr. Daugherty, and the country was impressed with the fact that the Harding campaign was clean; that there was no attempt to buy his nomination, and he sits in the White House to-day partially because of the cleanness of his campaign. If it had not been for that investigation, if it had not been for the light of publicity shining into the money chest of the Wood and Lowden committees, it is probable that one of them would have been nominated for President. No one can tell me that the Republican Party stands for corruption in elections.

In connection with the Michigan senatorial election the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections say the money was spent for "proper and legal purposes." Everything was "open and aboveboard," we are told; and there was "no concealment." These statements can not be sustained by the record. Senators could spend hours here reading the evidence of workers employed, from the beginning of the campaign to the end, setting forth conversations, statements, lists of names showing the enormous number of people employed to buy influence. Members of traveling men's associations, lodges, and labor organizations—the big workers—were to be secured, as King wrote to Newberry. Prosecuting attorneys in some counties received funds, which may account for the fact that there have been no prosecutions for violation of these Michigan laws. County road commissioners were corralled, because they travel around the counties. Luncheons and banquets were given and cigars distributed here and there and everywhere. Bankers were secured for their influence; different nationalities were worked through lawyers of the nationality being employed; men were employed to line up the marines, fishermen, the lifesavers. Other sickening and disgusting practices were followed. Sealed envelopes were laid on tables to be opened up by gentlemen with whom the conversations were held; fifty-dollar bills were left under books on tables. The president of the Railroad Men's Relief Association, with his monthly magazine, was brought around by advertisements; fraternal lodges were worked by various agents for stated stipends. One lecturer in a Masonic lodge was employed to talk with people in hotels and on trains. A member of the United Commercial Travelers was paid $850 salary and expenses to go around and talk with traveling men, and yet we are told that there was no violation of the statute; that only the usual and proper and legal methods of carrying on campaigns were employed. I deny that statement. The methods employed in conducting the campaign were corrupting and damning and were calculated to undermine the very structure of Government. Such methods can not continue under this Government, and they will not continue much longer.

It may be well to note the subsidizing of the press. A large part of the press of the State was subsidized. The most dangerous thing in this Government to-day is the power of great interests to subsidize portions of the American press. That is not a popular statement, but it is the truth, and it was shown in this case. It is conceded that at least $140,000 was spent for publicity purposes. It is claimed that Mr. Newberry was unknown in Michigan—which is hardly probable, for he had been Secretary of the Navy—that Mr. Ford was well known, and hence great publicity was necessary. So this unheard-of amount of money was expended for publicity.

Mr. King writes on July 6 to Mr. Newberry that "they have 201 papers openly supporting him," a man who had not been known, and "that this is quite remarkable." It is amazing how this large number of papers could be supporting a man that the majority report states "was practically unknown in the State."

Other methods are shown in the letter of King to Newberry of the 15th of August, in which he says:

> Our one weakness is with the labor vote. The Flint Labor News, which has been strongly Osborn, is weakening, and I am sending a man there to-day with a page advertisement for insertion just before the primaries. (B. E., 888.)

That is the skillful "within the law" way of doing things. That is the way some of the press is subsidized.

Mr. King testified that these 201 papers had some of their ammunition in the way of advertising and money payments. Ammunition was important. Osborn became short of ammunition. In a letter to King on the 9th of August, Mr. Newberry stated:

> There is much more information about Osborn's present plight I will tell you when I see you. The statement that he is short of ammunition is an absolute fact. (B. E., 881.)

What was the ammunition? Newberry's campaign committee was not short of ammunition. Money was the ammunition. Money is the ammunition that some gentlemen think can win any battle of ballots—and it can if the people do not know what is going on—and $263,000 is a lot of ammunition.

If Henry Ford had spent that much money and had presented himself here as a candidate, I should have voted against him just as quickly as I shall vote against Newberry. It is not a question, in my mind, at least, as between Ford and Newberry. Can anyone stand up here, in view of the letter of Mr. Newberry to Mr. King of the 9th of August, and say that Newberry had no knowledge of the ammunition that was being used in his campaign? Why was Osborn in a plight? He had no ammunition for the newspapers. And yet the statement was filed with the Senate under the law by Mr. Newberry that no moneys were received or expended with his knowledge or consent. I am not going to refer to that statement, because I have a real respect and affection for Mr. Newberry, and I think there is some mistake about it. There must be. He has been the victim of bad advice.

What more insidious and corrupting campaign can be carried on than by advertisements in newspapers for the purpose of affecting editorial opinion? Of course, it does not do so in every case, but when newspapers which have received large sums for advertisements become active in the support of the man who furnishes the money for the advertisements the ordinary individual has a right to be suspicious. There is no use in folding one's hands in holy prayer about it, for everyone knows that the majority of those newspapers were bought. You can not fool all of the people all the time about what is going on in this country under the influence of the big interests with the newspapers. We have seen it at work in the enormous advertisements of the packers throughout the country. We have seen it operate in presidential campaigns. It is apparently innocent, but in its effects it is powerful. No one can read the record in this case and not be satisfied that a large portion of the press of Michigan was subsidized in manner well known to the professional politicians.

The majority of the committee, in their report, say that none of the money spent in the primary election, large as was the amount, was spent for corrupt, illegal, or improper purposes. It was spent—> without the knowledge or consent of Truman H. Newberry, for publicity and for ordinary campaign purposes and expenditures which are perfectly familiar to every man who has ever been a candidate for office, and which are generally regarded as both necessary and proper.

I hope it is not regarded as necessary and proper for candidates for office to violate the laws of their State. I hope it is not regarded as necessary and proper to subsidize the public press; to expend $263,000 to secure a seat in the Senate of the United States. I think the committee will discover that while the majority of the committee may regard these things as necessary and proper the great mass of American citizens takes a contrary view.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAPPER in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. REED. I wish to know—for I have not had time to read the report—does the majority report say, in so many words, that the expenditure of $263,000 was necessary and proper?

Mr. KENYON. No; but it says the expenditures were necessary and proper.

Mr. REED. All expenditures?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; all expenditures.

Mr. REED. That is the same thing.

Mr. KENYON. And I am taking the $263,000 as my deduction.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. KENYON. The report filed here in the Secretary's office, I think, showed an expenditure of $176,000 or $178,000, and the Newberry brief concedes, as I remember it, an expenditure of $198,000 or $199,000. Then there are expenditures that were not counted at all but which appear in the record that run the expenditures up to $263,000. Undoubtedly twice that amount was spent.

Mr. REED. But the majority report undertakes to justify as necessary and proper the expenditure of this large sum of money?

Mr. KENYON. Oh, yes. The report says that the expenditure was too large, but was for entirely legal and proper purposes. Let me see if I can find that language in the report; but if the Senator wants to make any observations on it, I will tell him that is practically what the majority report says. Here it is:

> Your committee condemns the use of such a large sum of money in any primary campaign, but in the instant case there is not the slightest foundation upon which to connect Truman H. Newberry with its solicitation, its acquisition, or its use, nor to condemn him because of the amount. While the aggregate was large, it was not spent for any purposes that were in themselves illegal or improper.

Mr. REED. The committee condemns the use of the money, however. I will ask the Senator to read that again.

Mr. KENYON. Very well. It is interesting. I will read it the second time:

> Your committee condemns the use of such a large sum of money in any primary campaign, but in the instant case there is not the slightest foundation upon which to connect Truman H. Newberry with its solicitation, its acquisition, or its use, nor to condemn him because of the amount. While the aggregate was large, it was not spent for any purposes that were in themselves illegal or improper.

Now, I want to read the statement in the report that the Newberry campaign committee merely carried on the usual practices.

Mr. REED. The committee, then, does condemn the use of such a sum of money?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; they do.

Mr. REED. But the committee say that Newberry was not shown to be connected with it?

Mr. KENYON. They say he was not connected with it, but they concede that approximately $195,000 were spent.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator discussed the question of the mental competency of a man to sit here for whom $195,000 may be expended and he not know anything about it?

Mr. KENYON. I have referred to that in a mild way, but I am sure the Senator from Missouri could have placed it before the Senate much more effectively than I have.

On page 10 the committee themselves in their report concede that the Michigan statute prohibits the hiring of workers on primary day and prior thereto to induce persons to support or oppose any candidate, but they express horror at the charge that hundreds of workers were hired over the State in violation of the law, both the written statutes of Michigan and the common law. They find that the evidence entirely fails to sustain this charge, and that the clerks, stenographers, field men, and publicity men are not within the prohibition of the Michigan statutes. In view of the record and the hundreds of men who were employed to go out around the State to organize in lodges and every other conceivable place, who were paid fees to secure support for Mr. Newberry in open, flagrant violation of the Michigan statute, how can any committee, unless it be controlled entirely by personal or partisan bias, make any such finding? It could not stand in any court of justice for one moment.

Mr. President, I listened with great interest to the speech of the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] on this case. I have a very great affection for him, but that was an amazing speech. Before he came here I always thought of the Senator from Georgia—and that idea is not going to be destroyed now—as a man who stood for the truest things as he believed them and for the purity of elections. While I did not agree with him about many other things, and do not now agree with him, I felt that he stood for that, and his speech was a considerable shock. I respect his opinion; I am not quarreling with him. I can understand how a man can vote for Truman Newberry and say, "I do so because I admire him personally; I am sorry for him; I regret the unfortunate condition that he is in; I am going to stretch my conscience to help him on the ground of friendship." I can see how men can vote for him and say, "I hate Henry Ford, and I shall vote for Newberry because Ford should be kept out of the Senate, for he did not know whether Benedict Arnold or someone else wrote Arnold's Essays and the Light of Asia," as the Senator from Georgia so graphically pictured in his powerful argument, or whether the troops from Michigan fought with Andrew Jackson in the War of 1812; so have a care, people of the South. I can understand how a man might even do that. I can understand how he can vote for him and say, "I do so because the social bloc has worked so hard for Newberry." I can understand how he can do so and say, "I do so because he is a Republican and the Democrats are trying to make political capital of it"; but I can not understand how men can vote to seat him here on the theory that he had no part in the conduct of this campaign.

There are other things that could be discussed—sickening exhibitions of attempts to suppress evidence. The original books, records, and nearly all the checks which would have shown these transactions, were destroyed, lost, or stolen soon after the primary. Valuable records were kept in a barn; and, of course, stolen at the opportune time. There is the amazing story of Mr. Frederick P. Smith, financial secretary, that in the first week in September a paper sack had been delivered to him containing $21,000 in currency. No one knew where it came from. It was a complete shock to him. This interesting witness was unable to give a statement of moneys advanced and returned, because the books of the Newberrys had been stolen. It seems that the books in which contribution statistics were kept were stored in a barn for safekeeping; and, to the amazement of the witness, when he went to get the books and papers they had been stolen, and the barn doors were open. Sad, sad story! He was under the impression that the mysterious $21,000 in the paper sack had been deposited to the credit of John S. Newberry in one of the banks of Detroit. The committee apparently did not go into this question, and the bank officers were not brought.

At the end of the campaign certain books seem to have been prepared, the books of original entry having been destroyed. These new books showed no entries of thousands of dollars paid to hundreds of workers throughout the State; and I want to call attention to an amazing statement in the brief of Mr. Newberry's counsel in relation to this matter. On page 74 he says:

> To hire workers contrary to law or to do the things prohibited by the sections to which reference has been made—

That is, section 45—

> would subject the campaign to criticism; but the fact that no trace of such expenditures appears in the report or has yet been found shows quite conclusively there were no such expenditures.

How could they be found when there were new books prepared? Mr. Emery was the gentleman who would know about all of this, and Mr. Emery had disappeared.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] has made a plea for him. I do not want to be unkind or harsh about it. I have a sympathy for any man who was run over by a Ford car, as he says Mr. Emery was.

Payments of the office pay rolls were shown only to the extent of $1,500 per week, while the pay rolls every week amounted to $35,000. When it was sought from witnesses to discover where the money came from to meet the pay rolls, the responsibility was again placed upon the disappearing shoulders of the witness Emery. Emery was the gentleman who knew all about it, and Emery was the gentleman who left for Canada.

The check register pay roll and the Blair report were so fixed as to eliminate any showing of the hiring of paid workers for the primary. These records were destroyed after charges had been made throughout the State of unlawful expenditures of money, such charges being made by the lieutenant governor of the State and by leading newspapers. There is an unexplained mystery surrounding the destruction of these records. The whole case reeks with fraud and mystery. False returns were made to county agents. There was a doctored treasurer's report. Witnesses have disappeared. Newberry himself did not come before the committee and explain these charges and especially the report which he filed, under the law, with the Secretary of the Senate.

It is a shameful record of an attempt to secure the election by the use of tremendous sums of money and in a shrewd, careful way to avoid the statutes of Michigan. A lawyer was employed to keep those managing the campaign out of trouble, and King kept the statutes before him. Newberry himself could not expend more than $3,500; so, to avoid the statute, the "voluntary committee" was formed—a "voluntary committee" on which there was not a single volunteer. This committee spent the money, so that the argument can be drawn that Mr. Newberry did not violate the statute. If the committee had been voluntary, and he knew nothing about it, this might be true; but the committee was not voluntary, and he knew all about it. They were his agents. They spent his money. He is responsible for what they did, and in spending this sum they violated the law and he violated the law. If they bought the seat, the election is tainted.

There is no use of beating around the bush in this case. The cold fact is that this seat in the Senate was purchased, and the price paid was at least $263,000—not so outright as in the Lorimer case, where gentlemen seemed to desire to be purchased, but in a more insidious and genteel manner.

When the Payne case was in the United States Senate, some very pertinent things were said by the great Senators of that day. It was charged there that the views of the minority contained a startling proposition, never before announced in the Senate, and one which had never received a moment's consideration, where the minority said:

> As the Senate is the only court that can properly try this question, so the charge is made, if not in the only way it can be made yet certainly in the way beyond all others in which it can be made with most authority. * * * For the Senate to refuse to listen to this complaint so made would, it seems to us, be, and be everywhere taken to be, a declaration that it is indifferent to the question whether its seats are to be in the future the subject of bargain and sale, or may be presented by a few millionaires as a compliment to a friend.

Senator Frye, that great Senator from Maine who presided over this body so many years, said:

> I know, and so do they (referring to the people), that a man of great wealth who loves money easily grows into the idea that money is God—omnipotent, omniscient—can do whatever it pleases, and go whithersoever it may. I know that he proceeds upon the hypothesis that it can purchase anything he seeks or anything his heart may want. I know that he names his price for every man and declares that he can find a price that will fit.

That was not some wild, progressive Senator from the West. That was the great Senator from the conservative State of Maine speaking on an election case.

He further said:

> Sir, if popular government is still an experiment and shall become a failure, the failure will be the legitimate result of unfaithful citizenship. If this Republic shall be wrecked upon the shoals, the rock upon which it breaks shall be named corruption of the ballot. The ballot box is the fountain head of government of the people. Whosoever defiles that destroys the whole.
>
> The Senate can engage in no holier or more responsible duty than to devote itself to a work, however painful and disagreeable, that may result in a warning—a terrible warning—which shall sound from the East to the West, from the North to the South, declaring, with no uncertain voice, that corruption by money power of the citizen at the polls or of a legislature shall cease now.

In the Payne case, Senator Frye further said:

> It is the solemn duty of the United States Senate to see to it that Oliver H. Payne and Messrs. McLean and Thompson and Huntington and Page, and every other agent, if there are others, of the Standard Oil Co., shall come before a committee of the United States Senate, and, under oath, state whether or not they purchased a seat of a United States Senator.

He took the position that they all should be brought in. I do not know that you can bring a Senator in and compel him to testify. I should think, in view of the charges that have been made in this case, that Senator Newberry would have been quick to testify and explain them, and clear up this miserable mess, if it can be cleared.

Judge Thurman, that great Ohio Democrat, said with reference to the Payne case:

> The Democratic clock is put back four years, and corruption is given a new leasehold in our land; syndicates purchase the people's votes and honest men stand aghast.

In the inaugural address of the lieutenant governor of Michigan, a Republican, delivered in the Michigan Senate January 1, 1919, he said, referring to the Newberry candidacy:

> More communications on this line, asking for legislative action, have come to me by far than all others combined. * * * This, you know, is the outgrowth of the candidacy that doubtless cost more money than ever before was paid for a nomination for office in all the world's history.

That is a Republican lieutenant governor. It is apparent that the Republicans of Michigan do not regard this as a strictly party question.

Mr. President, what is the defense to this case? First, of course, that Mr. Newberry knew nothing about it. We might as well have had a phonographic record in this room and every time any question was asked let it grind out, "Mr. Newberry knew nothing about it." That is the one answer that has been given to almost all of the pertinent inquiries.

Go out and tell that to the American people.

The second defense is that Mr. Ford should have been defeated; that it was proper to spend any amount of money to keep a man out of this Chamber if he is a dangerous man in the view of Senators. I had supposed that was a question for the voters of a particular State. I hold no brief for Mr. Ford. I do not know him, and do not remember that I have ever seen him, and I have not been in accord with many things that he has done. I do not like the constant attacks of his paper upon the Jewish race. I could not agree with his extreme pacifist views before the war. I can not reach the conclusion that his occupying a seat in this body, if he had succeeded in the Michigan election, is so fraught with danger to the Republic that men were justified in breaking the laws on the theory that the end justified the means. He has been a fairly successful man in business. He has at least shown, on the one railroad that he owns, that railroad rates could be reduced. He has had no controversies with labor and has maintained high standards for labor. It has been said here that he is a dangerous man to be in the Senate, and possibly he is, and if Senators feel that way, they could, of course, justify themselves. There is some egotism in the United States Senate in contending or believing that he would lower the standards of this body, for, great as we concede we are, it is very probable, it is quite probable, that he is as great as some of us, though not so great as all.

If the statement is true that is referred to in the letter of Mr. Joy—which was evidently written as a campaign document, he being related to Mr. Newberry—that Ford had said American soldiers should have the word "murderer" branded on their uniform, then Mr. Ford would not be a fit man to sit in this body. I doubt if he ever said such a thing, as I want more evidence than a letter from a relative, intensely interested in this campaign. I want to know the truth of that statement. I believe the matter was thrashed out in the suit of Mr. Ford against the Chicago Tribune some time ago, but I have not been able to get the records. If Mr. Ford should present himself here—as I assume he may in some of the years to come—and present a certificate of election to this body, and the evidence to establish that he had ever used such language concerning the soldiers was as strong as the evidence is here to show that Mr. Newberry managed and conducted this campaign through his agents, I would vote unhesitatingly against the seating of Mr. Ford in this body.

It is easy to make attacks like this on men who are not here to defend themselves. The President of the United States evidently did not share in this belief of many Republicans that Mr. Ford was such a dangerous citizen, for he spent a very pleasant few days in camping with him and others some months ago. Thomas Edison, who is a fairly good American citizen, does not seem to share the same opinion as some Senators, for he was a member of the presidential camping party.

Secretary Weeks, who has suddenly leaped into fame as the destroyer of the agricultural bloc, did not share this opinion, because he had Mr. Ford come to see him about Muscle Shoals. If these gentlemen had believed that Mr. Ford has used this language as to the American soldiers, they would have scorned to be in his company on any occasion. Let us have some more proof of that before we really believe it.

Ford is not in this matter, except in one way. If a man takes the position that Ford was the kind of a man who should be defeated by the expenditure of any amount of money, then he is in here. If a man honestly believes that he was justified in doing it, how much squarer it would have been for Mr. Newberry to have come in and said: "Yes; I knew about this campaign—of course I did. Patriotic men came to me and wanted me to make the campaign. I did it. I did everything I could to win. I spent all the money I could, because I believed that Henry Ford was a dangerous man to his country."

If he had done that, and said, "Now, do as you will with me," we would have respected and honored Mr. Newberry. Instead of that we have this camouflage of pretending that he did not know anything about the campaign. No charges have been presented against him, at least none supported by evidence. If any were made, they have been abandoned by the committee. He was not in the campaign until long after Mr. Newberry. His contention for the seat has been abandoned. If Mr. Newberry is not seated, the governor of Michigan will appoint a Senator. The real point at issue is not Ford's candidacy; it is, Was the seat secured by corrupt methods? Can $263,000 be spent to secure an election to this body? That is the question you are going to answer on the stump. That is the question you are going to answer to the American people. They will understand the issue.

This election, as Lord Coke said in the Long case, "is tainted at its fountain." Mr. Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court of the United States, once said:

> The two great natural and historical enemies of all republics are open violence and insidious corruption.

If the Senate of the United States is to justify the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars to secure a seat here, the rule of the people is gone; no man of moderate means can attain a place in this body and no poor man or woman can ever dream of it. Put seats in the Senate up for sale; the price is going up. Auction them off. This country of ours has difficult enough problems to face. The good of the whole Nation is above and beyond the friendship of any man or the welfare of any man. The good of the Nation demands that seats in this body shall not be purchased; that they shall be secured through the free and fair and frank expression of the voters of the various States. I realize that the stage is completely set for this performance; that there will be very few votes from this side of the Chamber against Mr. Newberry retaining his seat.

I know the effective pleas that have been made. I know the activities of the social bloc and how effective it is. Do not talk so much about the agricultural bloc; talk a little about the social bloc.

It would please me personally, because of my liking for Mr. Newberry, to vote that he is entitled to his seat, but I can not in conscience do so. I realize men will vote on this case who have given absolutely no study to the record. It was thought it could be shoved through speedily at a time when the country's attention was diverted by the Disarmament Conference, but that did not succeed. There are those who will rush in at the last moment who have been out of the Chamber during the discussion, who can not explain this record to their constituents, and who will vote to seat Mr. Newberry simply for party reasons. There are others who will not vote; others who will be paired. Some, of course, for perfectly legitimate reasons, will vote for Mr. Newberry's right to his seat. There are some who will have official business elsewhere, but the people are going to understand the whole proceeding.

The Senate does not to-day stand any too well with the people of the United States. That is unfortunate, because it is a body of splendid men, earnestly devoted to the best welfare of the country. When the brand of approval was put upon the Stephenson campaign in Wisconsin, the Senate suffered in the opinion of the country; when the brand of approval of the Newberry campaign is now placed by the Senate upon his seat, it will suffer still more. The price of seats in the Senate has been going up. Senator Morrill, of Vermont, expressed horror at the expenditure of $15,000 in the Caldwell case. The Stephenson case raised the mark to $107,000. The Newberry case raises it to $263,000, though it should be considered in a perfectly fair discussion of the price of seats in the Senate that the purchasing power of the dollar has diminished since the Stephenson case.

This will not be the last of the Newberry case. You can not brush aside a thing of this kind, even though great and mighty international questions are before the people. It goes to the very fundamentals of the Government. The people of this country, who love their Government, are jealous of its integrity and hate the corrupting influences that purchase seats in the Congress. It is even worse to do it in insidious ways than to go out and buy it outright, as was done in the Lorimer case. It requires much more courage to buy elections in that way than it does to buy them in this way. If the price of seats goes up from $107,000 in 1912 to $263,000 in 1921, it certainly ought to reach the $500,000 mark in the next 10 years. What opportunity is there for the average everyday citizen, be it man or woman, to aspire to a seat in this body? You are undermining by the vote in this case the foundations of this Government, and the Republicans are not helping the Republican Party. I doubt if you really are performing a real act of friendship for Mr. Newberry, much as we like him and sorry as we are for his situation. The day is coming when this case will be heard in another court, the only court, save the Supreme Court, with higher jurisdiction, and that is the court of the great American people. There the question of pure elections and the purchase of seats in this body will be tried out. That means out in the places of business, workshops, on farms, on the rostrum and at the firesides of the American people. It will be tried out where men and women are now struggling over the hard vicissitudes of life, with the difficult problem of getting along on meager salaries and small incomes, and are watching the matter of the purchase of seats in the Senate. It will be a trial that will be worth while because the American people when they understand the question will decide it right. They will know the record even though many Senators do not, and there is as little question of the judgment there as there is of the verdict here; but be assured if Mr. Newberry is seated the judgment there will reverse the verdict here.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything on this case, but I want to occupy the time of the Senate for just a few minutes in order to outline my views.

For Senator Newberry I entertain the kindliest of personal feelings. In any question of doubt I would give to him the benefit of that doubt; but the evidence in this case, taken in the light of what every man acquainted with politics knows, can leave no possible question in the mind of any man who approaches its consideration with an open mind, that Senator Newberry was privy, if not party, to the expenditure of a sum of money so vast that money was made the determining thing in the election.

The expenditure of money in reasonable amounts for the purpose of exploiting a candidate's virtues is permissible, but if it is to be admitted as proper that money may become the chief element in the equation, then there is no limit to the amount that can be used, and we will soon find the Republic for sale, for when the offices of the Republic are for sale the Republic itself is upon the auction block.

Truth to tell, this bad state of affairs in Michigan arises largely from the fact that two men were nominated for the high office of Senator who never would have been dreamed of by any mortal man had they not each been the possessor of great wealth. I say that with all respect to Mr. Newberry, who is an intelligent man and an educated man; but he is not possessed of those qualities which would throw him to the forefront of a State, and cause him to be selected as the champion of some great principle or of some great party, certainly not unless he had worked his way to that position by having held other popular commissions.

If it had been a question of seeking men possessing forensic ability, ability as lawyers, ability of leadership, ability of organization, then there were thousands of men in the State of Michigan who would have been first thought of.

It was with the political managers undoubtedly this sort of case, first or last, that Henry Ford had a vast fortune and they wanted somebody who, in an appreciable degree, at least, could match dollars with him. It happens that it is not claimed that Ford expended large sums of money, but it is true that he had an enormous number of people directly in his employ; he had made a machine, an automobile, which had more ability to haul dollars to the Ford factory than to haul passengers over the highways, and he had accumulated a great fortune; and through his employees, scattered all over the State, it was figured he could exercise a commanding influence. If he had been merely running on his mental equipment, his nomination would not have been thought of by any second-rate idiot.

But he had money, vast sums of money, which I am glad the record failed to show he expended in this manner. In order to match dollars with a man who could command large sums of money, Mr. Newberry was nominated, and it is the only reason why he was nominated. Having been nominated, he and his friends made good the financial expectations. If the expenditure of a quarter of a million dollars can be proved, it is entirely likely that twice that sum was used.

So that the question which we have presented here is whether by our votes we propose to sanction the admission to this body of a man who comes here with a taint upon his title.

We are not deciding this case alone. If I were to decide it upon personal feelings alone, I would vote in favor of Mr. Newberry. But we are establishing a precedent. We have had one very bad precedent before this, the case of the former Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Stephenson. There, again, was a man, a splendid, rugged old character.

If the Senate of the United States was a body organized for the business of running a sawmill, there is no one in the world who would have been better qualified than Isaac Stephenson; but if the Senate was engaged in the business of making laws for 110,000,000 people there was hardly anybody possessing less qualification for the office. He was selected because he had money. He was picked by the grafters because he could be grafted, and was nominated because the grafters spent some of the money for the purposes for which it had been paid.

Our friends upon the other side of the Chamber are establishing some dangerous precedents for the country. Never, I think, but once before has it been charged that on this side of the Chamber vast sums of money were expended. In that instance the corruption was exposed by a Democrat in the general assembly of the State, the Senator was expelled from this body, and the member of the legislature who exposed the grafting in the first instance was promoted to this body. So the Democratic record is not very bad in that respect.

We had another very bad case on the other side—the Lorimer case. There was an expulsion, and it was to the credit of a part of the Republican Party that he was expelled. But in the Lorimer case, as I recall, the corruption was limited to the members of the legislature, while the leprosy in the pending case spreads to an entire State.

Is a United States senatorship to become like a string of pearls hung in the window of a jewelry store, that can be purchased for money, whether the money is that of a bawd or of a virtuous woman? Men competent and qualified to fill an office do not need to buy it.

The insidious march of corruption among a people is not to be overlooked. At first it is always scorned and treated with contempt, but if it be permitted and is persisted in people become accustomed to it, too much accustomed to it.

If you ask me why it is that China lies yonder like a vast jellyfish, that the shark nations can take a huge bite out of at will and thus destroy, I would answer that probably the chief reason is that for many years bribery has been a common thing among Chinese officials. Even now certain delegates from that land are charging that some other delegates are in the pay of Japan. If you were to ask the real cause for Russia's failure in the Great War and in the Japanese War you probably would find the answer in the truth of the charges that Russian officials pocketed the people's money and sent the soldiers to the front without the guns they should have purchased with that money. If you were to ask what is the source of two-thirds of the trouble in Mexico you would find it in the fact that it has been known for many years that to obtain justice in Mexico you must pave the way to justice with gold.

So that we to-day who vote upon that question must vote for the future of our country. I know how strongly partisan feeling may appeal to men, how tightly party lines may be drawn, but party lines and party reasons must give way in a case involving the integrity of the country itself.

I wonder if we were trying an ordinary prisoner at the bar, and if that ordinary man were charged with having stolen $263,000, and if his connection with the theft were proven as closely as the connection of Senator Newberry is proven with the financial transactions here involved, how long it would take a jury of 12 men to find the prisoner a particeps criminis in the transaction? I wonder if, instead of this being $263,000, it had been $263 and the prisoner at the bar was a man of humble means, how long it would take a court or jury to find that individual guilty?

So, Mr. President, without arguing further, it seems to me this case is complete, indisputable. If there were one thing needed to make it a certainty it is the failure of Senator Newberry to take the witness stand. I am perfectly aware that in criminal cases the citizen is permitted to remain from the stand and to refuse to give testimony against himself. I am perfectly aware of the rule that in criminal cases no inference is to be drawn against a prisoner at the bar for having failed to testify in his own behalf. It is a wise and a sound rule based upon considerations which I shall not take the time to mention.

But in a civil suit where the circumstances point toward and connect the plaintiff or the defendant with a transaction which requires and demands explanations, and the plaintiff or the defendant in the civil suit fails to take the stand, there is a presumption which follows from his failure to testify, a presumption that can be argued to the court, a presumption that is considered as exceedingly weighty, dependent, of course, upon the peculiar circumstances of each case.

If Senator Newberry did not know of the expenditure of this money, why did he not take the witness stand and say he did not know of it? If there was any circumstance requiring explanation and exculpation, why did he not take the stand to make that explanation? Here was a tribunal the members of which, regardless of politics, would have been glad to have heard him vindicate himself. But he did not take the stand.

He remained silent. I will not vote for a man who can not testify in his own behalf. I will not vote to seat a man who dare not open his lips regarding transactions which unexplained are condemnatory.

MARINE INSURANCE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, when the hour of 2 o'clock came the unfinished business came up, and the bill for the consideration of which I had received consent went to the calendar. I think it will take but a few moments to pass it. I ask unanimous consent to resume the consideration of Senate bill 2265.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to offer an amendment, to come in on page 26. Under the title of Chapter VII, I move to strike out all of the title except the words "Merger of companies." That title went in the bill as originally framed, and as finally modified and reported here the title should be changed to "Merger of companies."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 26, lines 1, 2, and 3, in the title, it is proposed to strike out the words "and membership in underwriters' associations and insurance syndicates," so that, if amended, it will read:

Chapter VII. Merger of companies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask to have printed in the RECORD the report of the committee, which gives pretty fully and concisely the terms of the bill and the necessity for the legislation.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on Commerce, submitted the following report to accompany S. 2265:

The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2265) to regulate marine insurance in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon, and recommend that the bill do pass without amendment.

No reasonable effort should be spared to build up an American merchant marine. We will probably have to use "heroic" measures to do it. One of the most important factors in the maintenance of a merchant marine and the development of foreign commerce is marine insurance. The nation whose citizens control marine insurance largely controls the world's marine and trade. The men and companies who do marine insurance learn the business methods and trade secrets of marine and commercial competitors, and they do this without disclosing anything of the practices or secrets of their own allied marine and commercial interests. It needs no argument to show the tremendous advantage this gives.

More than two-thirds of the insurance on American ships and cargoes is done by foreigners. More than three-fourths of American hull insurance is done by foreigners. This should not be, especially now, when we have such a large tonnage which we hope to have profitably operating in the foreign trade.

One of the great handicaps to the growth of American marine insurance is the diversity of our laws affecting it. Legislative jurisdiction over this subject rests with the various States. There is no uniformity in their legislation. Little account seems to have been taken by them of the broad interests of the Nation. No efforts have been made to aid in building up marine insurance. In fact, many States have provisions of law that are actual handicaps to it.

This bill is an attempt to show the Nation's interest in this subject and to suggest model legislation which it is hoped will be followed by the various States. It takes a nation's view of the problem, having due regard for local interests. It is an expression by the General Government of what is needed to serve a national purpose, in the hope that the various States will follow it as nearly as may be. Congress has jurisdiction over the subject for the District of Columbia. The hope and prospect of the formation of companies in the District of Columbia to act under this law is sufficient justification for its enactment, but it is frankly avowed that the chief benefit hoped to come from it will be the enactment of similar legislation in the various States of the Union.

The subject of marine insurance has been given much consideration by the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee of the House of Representatives during the last two years. Special investigations have been made and experts have been employed to study the question in all its aspects. This bill is largely the result of these studies and investigations. It has the approval of the insurance people of the country and of the representatives of the shipowners.

Prof. S. S. Huebner, the insurance expert, clearly states the situation as shown by the investigations, where, in his testimony before the Commerce Committee, he says:

"Now, it occurs to me that I might just briefly indicate the absence of our marine-insurance facilities, and then present the leading features of this bill.

"The investigation showed that about two-thirds of all the marine insurance originating in the United States, cargo and hull insurance combined, was written, either directly or by way of reinsurance, by foreign insurance companies. If our thought is centered on hull insurance only, it is correct to say that about 75 per cent of the marine insurance originating in this country is under foreign control.

"About one-half of all the reinsurance placed by American companies was placed with foreign underwriters, and a great majority of the American underwriters informed us that this was not due to choice but to necessity. Our facilities were so limited that an American company which could only accept a reasonable amount of insurance on a particular risk was obliged to resort to the foreign markets in order to place the insurance that was offered to it.

"The investigation also developed the fact that a very large proportion of the marine insurance originating in the United States was exported directly to the foreign markets; that is to say, it was placed with alien underwriters who did not even have a branch office in this country; that is to say, were not admitted companies. It is hard to say just how much insurance is exported in this way, but through correspondence I developed the fact that as regards 67 nonadmitted alien underwriters, we sent out $12,000,000 in premiums for the year 1918. This, however, excludes all the insurance that was placed with Lloyd's and many other sources that we no doubt did not discover. This exported insurance, you will understand, pays no taxes whatever to this country. All told, two-thirds of all American marine insurance originating in this country was under foreign control in the year 1918."

A similar bill has been reported to the House of Representatives, and the report on that bill is so clear, convincing, and comprehensive that it is not thought we can do better than to incorporate that report herein as follows:

"For many years marine insurance originating in the United States has been essentially under foreign domination. Probably no other strategic branch of American commerce has been handed over so completely to the control of foreign interests. An investigation conducted by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of this House and the United States Shipping Board, during 1919, revealed the fact that foreign underwriters control fully two-thirds of all American marine insurance, cargo and hull insurance combined. If hull insurance alone is considered, fully three-fourths of American marine insurance is under foreign control. The bulk of the business transacted by American companies was written by just a few, 2 companies receiving nearly one-fourth of the total net marine premium income and 10 nearly two-thirds. American companies placed, mainly through necessity and not choice, approximately one-half of all their reinsurance with foreign underwriters, admitted and nonadmitted, while the reinsurance placed by foreign underwriters with American companies was only about one-half the reinsurance placed by American companies with foreign underwriters. Moreover, American companies have never been able thus far to enter the foreign field to any appreciable extent, and in many important commercial countries not a single branch of an American marine insurance company may be found.

"The committee takes it for granted that no American citizen wishes to see such a deplorable state of affairs continue. Every witness appearing before the committee during its consideration of this bill expressed an ardent desire for a radical change, and that as soon as possible. There is pressing need for an ample and independent American marine insurance institution. Such an institution is absolutely essential to the maintenance of our merchant marine and the realization of our foreign trade opportunities. Our leading competitors have for years used marine insurance to preempt leading lines of trade. Nations that are strong in marine-insurance facilities may deny the service altogether or give it only under unfavorable conditions to the citizens of other nations which do not possess adequate facilities of their own. Possession of sufficient underwriting capacity, free from foreign control, is also essential to the proper protection of commercial secrets from our trade competitors. Foreign underwriters when insuring American cargoes necessarily learn the facts concerning the carriers used, the consignees, methods of packing and handling, financial affiliations of the consignors, costs of production, and the conditions and price of sales. But even in the absence of these important considerations, the committee is convinced that every legitimate endeavor should be made to prevent the needless flow of millions upon millions of dollars of premiums abroad. It may be necessary to send some abroad, but it is not necessary to send as much as we have been sending in the past.

"Judging from the testimony presented to the committee, it seems hopeless to effect any worth-while and permanent change unless the causes of the present situation are eliminated. These causes are two in number, namely, (1) the past failure of American companies to cooperate in the interest of economy and efficiency, as have their foreign competitors, and (2) the existence of legislative obstacles in the several States which unnecessarily restrict the underwriting activities of American companies as compared with their competitors, and which also impose financial burdens of such magnitude upon our companies as to make it impossible for them to meet foreign rates.

"The first of these causes the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of this House and the United States Shipping Board have sought to remove through the creation of the American Marine Insurance Syndicates, know as Syndicates A, B, and C. Syndicate A is a purely service syndicate, and represents a salvage association which will work hand in hand with the development of the market through the medium of the two underwriting syndicates (Syndicates B and C), and will be to the American shipping trade and to the American marine insurance market what the London Salvage Association is to the British shipping trade and the British marine insurance market. All the syndicates are now fully organized and functioning, and are enlarging the scope of their usefulness. Through these syndicates a total of $2,500,000 may be found promptly through a central office on a single vessel, each of the 50 member companies taking its allotted share of the total risk. Instead of the broker having to interview some 50 underwriting offices, as in the past, his work is now concentrated at one office, at a big saving of time and expense. One policy will take the place of 50 or 100 policies on a single risk. In the same way losses are settled through a central office by one check instead of the previous method of applying to each company for its share of the claim. Adjustment of losses will also be handled jointly at a great saving in time and expense, instead of having numerous companies represented by their individual adjusters. The new method simply represents the application to American marine insurance what our foreign competitors have been doing advantageously for many years. Cooperation in the field of marine insurance has been fostered abroad. By this means British companies have not only enlarged their underwriting capacity and strengthened their financial standing but have greatly reduced their overhead charges. They have been enabled to give adequate service, to eliminate irritating jealousies, and to act, whenever an international competitive situation presented itself, as one united force capable of pursuing an intelligent policy. Syndicate arrangements also assure greater convenience and speed in the handling of large lines of insurance, and facilitate the spread of large risks, thus fulfilling the function of automatic reinsurance.

"The second cause of our difficulties—the existence of legislative restrictions in the several States—it is sought to eliminate through the bill under consideration. Cooperative effort through syndicate arrangements is only half the problem. It remains to free our marine insurance companies from existing legislative obstructions, and thus place them on a parity with their foreign competitors, who are not obliged to operate under such restrictions. Present State statutes governing marine insurance are provincial in character and in nearly all instances were designed with special reference to fire insurance, without recognizing the vital differences between these two forms of insurance. They are not adapted to the regulation of a business which vitally affects our national commerce and which, unlike fire insurance, is essentially international in character and subject at all times to the keenest foreign competition.

"The bill under consideration reflects the conclusions of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of this House and the United States Shipping Board after a most exhaustive investigation of the whole subject. While regulating marine insurance, this bill is essentially a national commerce measure. Although drawn with special reference to the District of Columbia, and although benefiting the District in some very important respects to be referred to shortly, the real object of the measure is to serve as a model for marine insurance legislation in the several States. Owing to decisions of the United States Supreme Court, the several States possess complete supervisory control over insurance, and no other method of legislative procedure is therefore available. The bill has already received the earnest consideration of the National Convention of Insurance Commissioners. Moreover, several States have already enacted some of its leading features. Testimony before this committee was to the effect that what is needed is a congressional expression on what is really a national commerce measure. Such a national expression, it was confidently believed, would be met with whole-hearted support by the several States. It may also be added that in its present form the bill received the support of all witnesses appearing before this committee.

"While necessarily detailed in character, in order to apply the desired changes in a practical way, the bill under consideration aims to bring about four fundamental changes. These are—

"(1) Substitution of a system of net profits taxation for marine insurance in place of the present system of taxing gross premiums. American companies are generally taxed on their gross premiums, whereas British companies, our leading competitors, are taxed on net profits. All witnesses appearing before the committee agreed that the proposed change is right in principle. Premium taxation fails to take cognizance of the fact that a premium collected may nevertheless result in a loss. Profits taxation, on the contrary, recognizes the just principle of ability to pay. American underwriters insisted that taxation should, as in Great Britain, bear a proper relation to profits made. American marine insurance companies must compete with foreign underwriters, and in this competition success or failure is dependent largely upon the method of taxation used. Quoting the conclusion reached by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and the United States Shipping Board in their study of this question:

"'A small difference in rates, adverse to American companies, must necessarily direct the flow of business to the foreign market. Marine insurance differs vitally from other forms of insurance in respect to the incidence of taxation. It is essentially international in character and highly competitive, and unreasonable tax burdens imposed without reference to profits made, as is the case to-day, can not be shifted to policyholders through higher rates. Our underwriters have in the past labored under an adverse cost differential as compared with their foreign competitors. Heavy taxation, irrespective of profits, increases this cost differential. Reduction of excessive taxes reduces the cost differential—the key to the whole problem—and thus strengthens our companies in meeting foreign competition. The encouragement of American marine insurance—the enlargement of the volume of business written within the United States—by a policy of taxing profits instead of premiums does not mean a reduction in State revenue. A lower rate of taxation on a larger volume of business may yield a much larger revenue than is obtainable from a higher rate applied to the limited volume of business now transacted in this country.'

"(2) Establishment of the multiple insurance principle, so that American fire, marine, and fire-marine companies may be permitted to transact all kinds of insurance other than life insurance and fidelity and surety bonding. Nearly all our States require fire and marine companies to limit their underwriting to these two forms of insurance. British companies, on the contrary, have the privilege of writing numerous kinds of insurance, thus materially reducing overhead charges, enabling the companies to secure the support of business concerns by meeting their full insurance requirements, and increasing the financial stability of the companies, since various forms of insurance complement one another in that bad results in one branch are counterbalanced by good results in some other branch. To give American underwriters the advantages associated with the practice of multiple insurance, the bill gives marine, fire-marine, and fire companies the privilege of writing any lines other than life insurance and fidelity and surety bonding. But the bill is entirely fair to other kinds of companies in that it expressly provides that they also are privileged to write fire or marine insurance if they so desire. Section 3 of the bill expressly guards against any unsound practices by providing substantial increases in capital and surplus for each additional class of insurance written, and by regulating the declaration of dividends or the allocation of profits to general surplus. The provisions of the bill follow very closely the practice that has prevailed in England for many years, and with eminent success. The multiple principle has already been adopted by several of our States, and the plan is bound to become general in the near future. It would seem advisable to adopt the plan promptly at this strategic period in our commercial development.

"(3) Enlargement of reinsurance facilities. The absence of sufficient reinsurance facilities has proved one of the greatest handicaps to American companies, and has been responsible for the fact that a large proportion of our marine insurance has passed under the control of foreign interests by way of reinsurance, with comparatively little reciprocity in this respect from foreign underwriters. A summary of American legislation with respect to reinsurance shows that it is narrow and restrictive. To best serve the business community, reinsurance facilities should be sufficient. To accomplish this purpose the bill under consideration enables direct-writing companies to exchange business with other companies, if meeting proper standards of solvency, so freely as to make the reinsurance automatic and practically national in scope.

"(4) Removal of existing limitations on the financial powers of companies which hamper operations in foreign fields. It is vital that American marine insurance companies extend their operations to foreign fields, although as yet they have scarcely made a beginning in this respect. By establishing themselves in all parts of the world, British companies succeed in obtaining an enormous volume of business and an unequaled diversity of hazard. Through the use of foreign markets they share in the premium income of almost every trade and thus obtain the benefits of a fairly constant and diversified premium income. Furthermore, loss in any market during a particular period is apt to be counterbalanced by a profit in some other market. English merchants are afforded everywhere the convenience of adequate underwriting facilities near at hand so that they may feel free to extend their activities because of the certainty of a continuous insurance market. Moreover, facilities exist for the prompt adjustment of losses at distant points. In view of so many advantages, it is regrettable that when an American company is required by the foreign nation within which it transacts business to make a deposit in securities of the foreign Government, or otherwise, a considerable number of our States refuse to allow the excess of such deposit, over the legal reserve liability, as an asset in the company's home statement. Again, numerous States are very illiberal with respect to the allowance, as admitted assets, of agents' balances in foreign countries, which are collectible, but which are overdue, owing to necessary delays in transmitting reports and funds from distant points or to the necessary extension of longer credits to meet foreign competition. In both of these respects the bill under consideration provides for liberal but proper treatment, so that American companies may find it possible to start branch offices in foreign markets.

"Although H. R. 6775 is essentially a national commerce measure and is intended to serve as a model for enactment in the several States, one should not lose sight of the fact that various sections of the bill are designed to benefit the District of Columbia in very important particulars. Section 3 provides for the creation of corporations for the sole purpose of transacting a reinsurance business, and there seems to be no reasons why purely reinsurance companies can not advantageously organize in the District of Columbia. Section 21 provides for the organization within the District of corporations engaged exclusively in the writing of insurance in foreign countries, the capital stock of which corporations may be owned by American companies engaged in the same kind of insurance. The other sections of the bill will serve very materially in fostering the success of these two types of companies, as well as other companies which may decide to organize within the District. Moreover, the American Marine Insurance Syndicates, to which reference has alreay been made, have their legal domicile in the District, and one of the essential purposes of the entire bill is to bring about a legislative situation under which these syndicates may develop and thrive.

"The Committee on the District of Columbia recommends the passage of this bill because it believes its provisions will foster the development of an American marine insurance business, thus, in turn, greatly benefiting our merchant marine and our foreign trade. The purpose of the bill is to place American underwriters on a parity with their foreign competitors by removing legislative obstacles which now stand in the way of the progress of American companies and with which their foreign competitors are not obliged to contend. There is nothing radical about this measure.

"The practices and principles which it aims to bring about have been used by our leading competitors for many years with eminent success and with great benefit to their own companies and much harm to our own. The bill proposes to modernize our legislation as it relates to marine insurance, and thus give our companies the opportunity now enjoyed by their competitors under the more modern legislation of their own countries. As one witness explained, 'The sole purpose of the bill is to bring about conditions of fair play in our own country for our own people.'

"The present seems an opportune time to legislate specifically with reference to marine insurance and to recognize in such legislation the fundamental problems of a legislative character now confronting the business, owing to its competitive and international character. As stated, present State statutes governing marine insurance are provincial and archaic. All parties appearing before the committee expressed themselves in favor of a change and all supported the provisions of this bill. The belief of those appearing before the committee was general that Congress should give a national expression on what is really a national problem, and that the several States would then be much more apt to legislate in the interest of the national welfare. The necessity for changing from a provincial to a world policy in respect to marine insurance is urgent, and the prospect of intense international rivalry for commercial position should double our efforts."

In addition to the hearings before the House committee the Senate Commerce Committee had extensive hearings which have been printed and are available.

THE FOUR-POWER TREATY.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to preserve in the archives of our Government some statements that should not perish for want of appropriate embalming. Nearly everything that has been said by the President of the United States up to date, whether he was on a fishing expedition, sailing the turbid waters of the southern seas in a senatorial scow, or golfing on the green, has been put into the RECORD, but somehow or other his admirers have not put his last two recent statements in the RECORD. They ought to be put there, both in the interest of history and in the interest of humor.

I read in the Washington Post to-day an article by Albert W. Fox. I think I might say, in passing, that Mr. Fox seems to be one of the official spokesmen of the White House. He is a widely read author and quite often carries a censer that emits very sweet perfumes as he travels. I say that because the article has more force from such a source.

Mr. Fox states:

The following statement was issued last evening from the White House:

"When the President was responding to press inquiries at the afternoon interview to-day he expressed the opinion that the homeland of Japan did not come within the words 'insular possessions and insular dominions' under the four-party agreement, except as territory proper of any other nation which is a party to the agreement."

I wonder why the President said that? The treaty had been attacked upon the floor of the Senate. A statement had been made upon the floor of the Senate that Mr. Hughes had said to the newspaper correspondents that the mainland of Japan—I presume by the "mainland" the chief islands are meant—did come within the treaty. It, of course, provoked considerable opposition; whereupon the President makes haste to say that it does not come within the treaty. The inevitable inference is that the President thought it ought not to come within the treaty. He was defending the treaty against unjust and iniquitous assaults by asserting that the mainland was not included at all and therefore that objection was removed. But Mr. Fox, after stating that the President made that statement in the forenoon, continues:

This expression has been emphasized as a division between the President and the delegates to the conference in construing the four-party agreement.

The President announced to-night that the difference in view in no wise will be permitted to embarrass the conference or the ratification of the agreement. He had assumed all along that the spirit of the conference contemplates a confidence which pledges respect of territory in every way which tends to promote lasting peace.

He has learned from the United States delegates to the conference that they have agreed to the construction which includes the homeland of Japan in the term "insular possessions and insular dominions," and has no objection to that construction.

It rather appalled the country when it was suspected that this treaty was so drawn that the United States would be obliged to protect the mainland of Japan against assault, for plainly there is no corresponding agreement by Japan to protect the mainland of the United States. Certainly if we have agreed to protect the mainland of Japan against assault and the Japanese have not made any corresponding agreement to protect us against assault, for us this is a jug-handled arrangement, and Japan has hold of the handle.

When a newspaper man of repute stated to me that he knew that Secretary Hughes had made that statement, I questioned him very critically to be sure that he was not mistaken, and finally ventured to make the charge upon the floor. Immediately the President comes forward and says that that is not the case; he defends the treaty against that aspersion. Of course, the virtue then, which he ascribed to the treaty, was that it did not possess the vice of being one-sided and of binding the United States to defend the entire Japanese Empire; that was a reason why it could be accepted; that was the virtue it had, namely, it did not bind us in that regard. As soon, however, as he finds out what has in fact and solemnly been agreed upon, when Mr. Hughes and perhaps Mr. UNDERWOOD and Mr. LODGE call upon him and tell him of the official construction, he says, in paraphrase, "That does not make a bit of difference then. It is all right, anyway. It is just as good one way as another to protect the whole Japanese Empire or to guarantee the security only of some islands that Japan has. Whatever is is right; and you have acted for the best. If this thing guarantees the entire Japanese Empire, it is right and beautiful, and if it does not guarantee the entire Japanese Empire, so much the better, it is more virtuous and comely, but in either event whatever has been agreed upon is a good thing."

I asked the Senator from Arkansas if he did not know of some illustration of that sort of reasoning, and he said he did. He said that down in his State there were a blacksmith and a wheelwright who were going to form a partnership, but did not know how to word their sign in order to represent both trades, and so they finally evolved this: "All kinds of twisting and turning done here." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, the New York Times contains an exceedingly interesting article in which these opposite views are set forth. I do not want to take the time of the Senate to read the article except in part, but I ask to insert the entire article in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. REED. It will be noted that the article states:

Following the publication by the New York Times last week of the fact that during the negotiations, held in secret, it had been agreed by all of the delegations that the measures of protection for "insular possessions and insular dominions" provided in the compact applied to the islands of Japan proper, it had been admitted by spokesmen for all four delegations that this was the case. The announcement from the White House caused surprise because it looked as if the President were weakening the position of the American delegation.

But this evening the White House issued another statement saying that, although the President had expressed earlier in the day the opinion that the islands of Japan proper were not included in the provisions of the treaty, he had learned from American delegates that they had accepted the construction that Japan was thus included and that he had "no objection to that construction."

Is he not easy going? Whatever construction you want to put on it it is all right with Warren.

It is apparent that the President and Secretary Hughes, the chairman of the America delegation, had a conference between the times of the two statements.

Is it not astounding and is it not appalling that these conferences are so secret that the President of the United States does not know whether an agreement we are asked to sign and which is to last for 10 years is to bind us to send our sons to defend the mainland of Japan—its main islands—or whether it is a treaty that merely binds us to keep the enemy off little islands that Japan may have scattered through the ocean?

Is entering upon an agreement that might involve this country in war and bloodshed so trivial a thing as that? Would it not be worth while for the President of the United States to know what was going on?

This agreement had been published for days. Six or seven days had gone by, and I venture to say that the President would not have known of such a construction to this hour if enterprising newspaper men had not brought to light these facts, hidden until then behind the locked doors where this agreement was written, nor then if it had not been exposed in the papers and on the floor of the Senate.

Before the meeting of the conference there was some advocacy here of entirely open sessions. The answer was that the negotiations would be as open as they could be. We who supported open sessions did so then with the idea that the American public, the masses living at a distance, might know what was going on. Now, I am in favor of open sessions so that the President may know what is going on. I insist that he shall have some sort of a direct line of communication. If he can not get communication in any other way, let us have the wireless telegraph instruments flash the news to him by the way of Yap.

How is the Government functioning when the head of the Nation, who calls the conference, does not know whether we are guaranteeing an entire empire or just a few islands scattered in the Pacific? There is not a Japanese statesman who is not smart enough never to ask his country to guarantee the United States or England as long as he can make a trade with them by which the United States and England will guarantee his mainland, and in return he only guarantees the islands of Great Britain and of America.

Now, mark you, there can be no escape on the ground that we are dealing only with the question of agreeing not to attack, not to interfere with the rights of Japan in its mainland, for of course this treaty embraces the thought that none of these countries will interfere with the rights of the others upon the mainland or upon their islands. We are dealing here entirely with the proposition of guaranteeing against attack the islands of the contracting countries; and when we guarantee against attack the islands, that is a very different thing from guaranteeing the mainland against attack, although it is difficult to say how soon a war would spread from the one to the other.

I wonder how long the British representatives would be permitted by their Government to remain here if they were to admit that they had guaranteed the mainland of Japan against attack, and did not know it.

I wonder how long the Japanese statesman would stay here if he were to admit that he had guaranteed the mainland of America, and did not find it out until some newspaper man chanced to enlighten him. I wonder if the people of the United States and the Senate are ready to follow blindly now the lead of men who make treaties and do not know whether they are guaranteeing empires or are guaranteeing little islands in the Pacific Ocean—islands that, like lilies, "o'erlace the sea"; little atolls that come up to breathe. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, it is a serious hour for this Republic. To begin with, the men who drafted that treaty deliberately drafted it to deceive the American people. If they meant to include all of Japan, and meant that the Senate and the people of the United States should know the fact, they would have written in it the words "the Empire of Japan." They wrote "insular possessions and insular dominions." It is the equivalent of the action of the tricky lawyer who writes an insurance policy and slips in a joker that entirely changes the force of the instrument.

The people of this country will do well to watch with both eyes, and listen with both ears, and examine with microscopes what is done by any set of men who write ambiguous language of this kind into instruments—language so ambiguous that the President of the United States himself misconstrues it and is deceived thereby; language that is to be explained and construed according to some secret arrangements that have been secretly made behind locked doors. If this thing keeps on, article 10 of the League of Nations will become respectable, and the drafters of the Versailles treaty will be regarded as the most candid of men.

The article referred to is as follows:

HARDING FIRST DISPUTES, THEN ACCEPTS, FOUR-POWER TREATY SCOPE TO COVER JAPAN; FINDS OUR DELEGATES HAD AGREED TO IT—PRESIDENT SOON REASSURES—WILL NOT PERMIT DIFFERENCE OF VIEW TO EMBARRASS CONFERENCE—CONSULTS WITH DELEGATES—OPINION THAT TREATY DOES NOT COVER ALL JAPAN WAS EXPRESSED TO NEWSPAPER GROUP—CAUSED GREAT SURPRISE—KATO SAYS THE POINT IN QUESTION IS BEING INTERPRETED BY TOKYO OFFICIALS.

(By Edwin L. James.)

[Special to the New York Times.]

No little consternation was caused to-day by the announcement from the White House in the early afternoon that President Harding construed the terms of the four-power treaty among Great Britain, America, France, and Japan as not including in its terms the islands which form Japan proper.

Following the publication by the New York Times last week of the fact that during the negotiations, held in secret, it had been agreed by all of the delegations that the measures of protection for "insular possessions and insular dominions" provided in the compact applied to the islands of Japan proper, it had been admitted by spokesmen for all four delegations that this was the case. The announcement from the White House caused surprise, because it looked as if the President were weakening the position of the American delegation.

But this evening the White House issued another statement, saying that although the President had expressed earlier in the day the opinion that the islands of Japan proper were not included in the provisions of the treaty, he had learned from the American delegates that they had accepted the construction that Japan was thus included and that he had "no objection to that construction." It is apparent that the President and Secretary Hughes, the chairman of the American delegation, had a conference between the times of the two statements.

It is difficult to exaggerate the impression caused by the White House announcement made about 1 o'clock. It was at the regular biweekly conference with the newspaper men that the President, in response to a written question as to whether or not the treaty provisions applied to the main islands of Japan, made it known that he did not take that view, holding that the provisions of the treaty no more applied to the islands constituting Japan proper than they applied to the mainland of the United States.

It was his opinion that the treaty applied to the dependent islands of the four powers, and that the islands which formed Japan proper were the domain of one of the parties to the treaty and not dependent islands.

BECAME OVERSHADOWING QUESTION.

All other subjects of discussion about the conference immediately fell into the shade. The question was asked. Had the President, following the Senate opposition to the treaty on the ground that it looked like a guarantee to Japan caused a shift of the American Government's attitude, or, as seemed more probable, had there been a reconsideration of the terms of the treaty and had it been agreed by the four powers that it did not include Japan proper?

A canvass was made of the delegations, but no substantiation could be found for the theory that there had been a reconsideration. In fact, it was flatly denied. A direct question to the British delegation as to whether there had been a change on the part of the diplomats brought a negative answer. A question as to whether or not the treaty applied to Japan proper brought an affirmative answer.

An effort was made to learn from Secretary Hughes what had happened, but the Secretary of State would not discuss what had come from the White House.

It was recalled that during the negotiations there had been considerable discussion as to whether the terms included Japan proper. After the British had presented the view that Japan was included, it was also recalled there had been a general agreement that this was true, although the Japanese had not pressed for that construction themselves. An official of the American delegation had so often repeated that Japan proper was included that some peevishness had been shown at a repetition of the question. All of the delegations in the last week had stated in the most direct manner that the treaty provisions did apply to Japan.

The White House had let it be known last Friday that President Harding did not believe that the treaty bound any power to go to war in defense of another power signatory to the treaty if it did not wish to do so. That seemed to indicate an acceptance of the construction that the treaty applied to Japan proper, since it was in reply to a question to that effect that the White House satement had been made.

At his 5.30 o'clock conference to-day Baron Kato, head of the Japanese delegation, definitely avoided questions relating to the incident. He said he would have to consult Tokyo before stating just what the treaty meant.

It is to be doubted that the White House statement to-night ends the incident. Certainly it would appear to give ammunition to the critics of the treaty that a week after it had been signed the President and the American delegation differed over what it meant.

It is true that the inclusion of Japan is not to be gathered directly from the terms of the treaty, which has been for more than a week in the hands of President Harding. It is true that in his speech of presentation Senator LODGE, of the American delegation, did not mention Japan proper, although he reviewed most of the islands in the Pacific. Yet it seemed to observers almost impossible that President Harding did not know of the controversy which has been in progress over the meaning of the treaty.

In the White House statement to-night it is not made entirely clear that the President has retreated from his view that Japan proper is not included. The statement says that "the difference in view" shall not be permitted to embarrass the conference. That leaves the impression that the difference in view still exists, although the statement says that the President has no objection to the construction of the treaty which makes its terms include Japan.

It was mentioned to-night in connection with to-day's incident that the American delegation was reported not to have been entirely in accord with the time chosen by the President three weeks ago to emphasize the American desire for the establishment of a definite system of international conferences to grow out of the present meeting. The soft pedal was immediately put upon discussion of the plan, and little has been heard of it officially since. It was taken at the time as an expression of the President's personal ideas.

That is the construction which will probably be given to the White House statement of early this afternoon. In so far as he caused embarrassment to the American delegation, the President has evidently done his best to repair the damage.

CONSULTED LODGE AND UNDERWOOD.

[Associated Press.]

A difference in view as to the application of the new four-power Pacific treaty has arisen between President Harding and the American arms delegates, but the President announced in a public statement to-night that it would not be permitted to embarrass the work of the Washington conference.

In the President's personal opinion, as outlined during the day to newspaper correspondents, the principal islands of the Japanese Empire are not to be regarded as included among the insular territories to which the treaty applies.

The American delegation, on the other hand, agreed with the representatives of the other powers before the treaty was signed that the principal Japanese group was to be covered under the agreement along with all the other Pacific islands under the sovereignty of the United States, Great Britain, France, and Japan.

In his formal statement, issued after a two-hour conference with Senators LODGE and UNDERWOOD, of the American delegation, the President said he had "no objection" to the interpretation agreed to by this Government's plenipotentiaries, but assumed that the spirit of the conference contemplated respect for territory in every way that would promote peace.

The President's original announcement of his views created a stir among the delegates of all the powers, and although none of them was willing openly to take issue with him, there were intimations that such an interpretation of the treaty was certain to be challenged eventually from several quarters. His later statement generally was accepted by the foreign representatives as having determined definitely the attitude of the American Government.

The language of the treaty thus brought in question has been the subject of Senate discussion, and in response to inquiries based on the assertions of the opponents of ratification spokesmen for the American delegation have said repeatedly that the major Japanese group must be regarded as included within the provisions of the agreement.

SPOKE WITHOUT CONSULTATION.

When he set forth an opposite view to-day, Mr. Harding was said by officials close to him to have acted without consultation with his State Department advisers and without any definite purpose of announcing the attitude of the administration. It was declared that he was merely voicing a personal opinion and had no thought of precipitating a clash in conference circles.

The effect on the delegates, however, was immediately apparent. None of them would comment, but among the Americans, British, French, and Japanese alike there was evident a desire to have the attitude of the American Government clarified at once.

The American delegation held a meeting, and as Senators LODGE and UNDERWOOD were hastening to the White House a British spokesman not directly connected with the British delegation was telling newspaper correspondents that a view directly opposite to that of the President had been communicated to the other powers by the American plenipotentiaries during the negotiations.

Baron Kato, head of the Japanese delegation, was one of those who showed the greatest interest in the President's attitude. A pledge of secrecy, said the Japanese statesman, prevented him from divulging whether there had been an agreement as to the application of the treaty to the principal Japanese islands, and he added that "the meaning adopted at the time of signing might be changed in the future, so I can say nothing at this time."

EXPLAINS EXTENT OF SECRECY.

Baron Kato's statement in declining to discuss the President's views revealed for the first time the precaution taken to prevent details of the negotiations from becoming public.

"I am morally bound," said Baron Kato when asked whether an agreement on the application of the treaty had been reached, "to say nothing about it. I can not even say whether there was an agreement among all the plenipotentiaries as to what the treaty meant, because that would be a violation of our understanding that nothing is to be said about such conversations."

In the cross-examination by newspaper men, a Japanese correspondent asked:

"Are we to understand that the Japanese delegates signed this treaty without a definite understanding of the treaty itself?"

"The meaning adopted at the time of signing," replied Baron Kato, "might be changed in the future, so I can say nothing at this time."

TOKYO EXAMINING PLEDGE.

Later he supplemented this answer by explaining that when treaties are signed questions often arise as to the exact meaning of terms in the text. He said he had cabled the text to Tokyo, where the various branches of the Government were examining not only the point raised by his interrogators, but other features and until the study was concluded and communicated to him he could not speak.

He declined to answer another question as to whether, when the treaty was signed, Japan had recorded any reservations concerning the interpretation of the agreement.

Unofficial Japanese to-night seemed considerably disturbed over the possibility of a misunderstanding over the exact interpretation of the treaty. They said that if Japan had any desire to have her rights respected, it would not be so much in the islands comprising the mainland of Japan as in the peninsula of Korea, which was annexed by Japan some years ago, after a period of protectorate. It would be in Korea, he said, that Japan would especially require some guarantee as to the maintenance of her rights, because it is across the northern frontier of that country that Japan has most to fear an attack directed from China or Russia upon her "mainland," the three large islands of Hokkaido, Hongo, and Kyushu.

SAY JAPANESE WERE RELUCTANT.

In British quarters it was said that it was the British and Americans who took the lead in framing the treaty so as to apply to all the Japanese group and that the Japanese for a time opposed the arrangement. Arthur J. Balfour, head of the British, was declared to have been insistent on including the major Japanese islands if the British Dominions of Australia and New Zealand were to be taken in.

Definition of the geographical scope of the treaty, as finally agreed to, is included in article 1 of the agreement, which reads:

"The high contracting parties agree as between themselves to respect their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean."

As interpreted by Mr. Harding in his conference with the correspondents, this language would not apply to the mainland or so-called "mainland islands" of any of the contracting powers. He was said to feel that Japan proper would no more be included among the Pacific islands, for the purposes of the treaty, than would the mainland of the United States. The islands of the chief Japanese group were considered by him as constituting a party to the treaty rather than a possession or dominion to be dealt with by it.

APPEAL OF KOREA.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, some days ago the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] had printed in the RECORD the petition of Korea to the present disarmament conference in Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the appeal of Korea may be printed as a Senate document. It is a subject of intense interest to many people.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, December 22, 1921, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, December 21, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thou hast done great things for us, whereof we are glad. May we worthily praise and laud Thy holy name. Surely Thou hast not forgotten us. Read our innermost hearts and see what we require. Then lay Thy hand upon us and bless us with a gentle, unmurmuring patience. Help us to magnify Thee in our common duty and triumph in conquest over all temptation. Be our anchor in the restless sea of life; be our lamp when the cloud lowers above our pathway, and when the storm is highest may we find rest at Thy side. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MEMORIAL HIGHWAY IN FRANCE AND BELGIUM.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein a short report by the secretary of the American Scenic and Historic Preservation Society relating to the subject matter of a bill recently introduced by me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report referred to is as follows:

The principal object of the creation of the proposed memorial highway commission is the establishment of a memorial highway to facilitate access to the fields of operation of the World War in France and Belgium, and to secure the erection of suitable memorials along such highway indicating the history of their respective localities or neighborhoods and perpetuating the memory of the American troops which took part in the operations in the various sectors along the route.

For this purpose it is proposed that existing highways be linked together and improved, where necessary and possible, after the manner of the Lincoln Highway in the United States.

The Lincoln Highway consists of a chain of State, county, and municipal highways, starting from the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D. C., with a branch to the Arlington (Va.) National Cemetery, runs through Maryland into Pennsylvania, where it passes the Gettysburg Battle Field and National Cemetery, and thence runs westward to the Pacific Ocean. Along this route tablets have been erected commemorating historical events that have occurred all the way across the continent. The route is further indicated by red, white, and blue bands painted on the telegraph and telephone poles and guideposts. The roads are usually the ones most frequented in the regions through which they pass, and their development and improvement, under the stimulus of the historical and civic interest aroused, have greatly facilitated travel and benefited the communities through which they run.

The great number of Americans who now go to France and Belgium, some to revisit the scenes of their military service overseas, others to visit the places where relatives served, and still others to study the fields of operation in the World War from the historical standpoint, will increase rather than decrease as time goes on. Not only will the financial means for travel increase with the return of normal times but in the order of nature future generations will multiply the number of descendants or relatives of the 2,000,000 Americans who went to France in 1917–18—descendants and relatives who will take pride in the achievements of their predecessors and wish to visit the scenes of their service. It is desirable that such travel be encouraged in order that the patriotic memories of the World War may be cherished, and also that the bonds of friendship between the United States and the allied nations may be strengthened by continued mutual intercourse. It is needless to say that Americans are welcome guests in France and Belgium, and that any measures which would promote their visiting would have cordial sympathy and encouragement.

The routes tentatively suggested for the memorial highway in France and Belgium are as follows:

1. Paris to Coblenz: This route starts from Paris, near which, at Suresnes, is one of the six permanent American cemeteries in France. Thence it runs northeastward through Meaux to Chateau-Thierry, near which, at Belleau, is another of the permanent American cemeteries. Thence it runs along the Marne River to Epernay, where it turns northward to Rheims; thence goes eastward to Montfaucon. A short distance north of Montfaucon is the Meuse-Argonne permanent cemetery for Americans at Romagne. From Montfaucon the route runs northward to Stenay, thence in a generally northeastward direction along the route taken by the American army of occupation through Montmedy, Longuyon, Longwy, Luxembourg, and Treves to the Coblenz bridgehead on the Rhine.

2. Verdun-St. Mihiel-Toul-Metz route: This route leaves the Paris-Coblenz route at Montfaucon and runs southeastward to Verdun, thence southward and southeastward through St. Mihiel to Toul. There it turns sharply to the northward and runs through Flirey, passes another of the permanent American cemeteries called the St. Mihiel Cemetery at Thiaucourt, continues northward to Mars-la-Tour, eastward to Metz, and northward through Thionville to Luxembourg, where it rejoins the Paris-Coblenz route.

3. Chateau-Thierry to Brussels: This route leaves the Paris-Coblenz route at Chateau-Thierry and runs in a generally northward and northwestward direction through Soissons, passing near the Oise-Aisne permanent cemetery for Americans, and thence paralleling the Hindenburg line to Peronne, passing near the Somme Cemetery for Americans at Bony. From Peronne the route may run directly northward to Arras, or make a detour westward to Amiens, thence northeastward to Arras. From the latter point the tentative route continues northward to Oostroosebeke in Belgium where the Ninety-first American Division was located when the war ended, thence eastward to Brussels. This route would pass a proposed American cemetery in Belgium.

It will be observed that these suggested routes lead through or near the scenes of most of the major operations in which the American troops and the Allies took part; also near the seven principal permanent American cemeteries in France and Belgium. The routes above described are only tentative, but are suggested to show the possibilities of the plan. The permanent routes would be selected in cooperation with the French and Belgian authorities if the plan meets with their approval.

It is suggested that the Memorial Highway be indicated by suitable markers or by the national colors, somewhat after the manner of the Lincoln Highway in the United States.

Along this Memorial Highway it is proposed that simple historical tablets be erected giving designations of the American divisions engaged at or near the points passed by the highways, the names of the commanders, and the dates of the engagements, with other appropriate data showing the relation of their movements to those of allied divisions. It is hoped that the French and Belgians will cooperate in erecting similar tablets, so that the series will tell the chief historical events of the entire route. It is not proposed to erect elaborate monuments along the Memorial Highway, but it is suggested that the tablets might be elevated on battle mounds, on or near which there might be small parks of military trophies, heaps of war relics, specimens of barbed-wire entanglements, "tanks," and other devices illustrative of the military operations in the neighborhood.

It is recommended that at Coblenz there be erected two bronze tablets, one containing the roster of troops of the American Army of Occupation and the other the roster of the present American forces in Germany, after the style of the bronze tablets to commemorate the campaign of Santiago de Cuba and of the China relief expedition.

It is suggested that the American Memorial Commission, to be appointed by the President of the United States, include the Hon. Myron T. Herrick, ambassador to France, the Hon. Brand Whitlock, ambassador to Belgium, Maj. Gen. Henry T. Allen, commanding the first American Army of Occupation, President Lowell, of Harvard University, representing the New England States, President Butler, of Columbia University, representing New York, and other distinguished Americans of similar character.

It is proposed that the Quartermaster General of the Army have charge of the wording, making, and care of the memorial tablets, in order to insure their historical accuracy, and that their design be approved by the National Fine Arts Commission at Washington.

It is also recommended that the National Fine Arts Commission act in an advisory capacity with the Quartermaster General of the Army in the laying out and care of the American cemeteries in France and Belgium.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of the distressed and starving people of Russia, had insisted upon its amendments, had requested a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. SMOOT, Mr. JONES of Washington, and Mr. OVERMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 205) relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speakers' table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 205. An act relating to the fiscal system of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

RUSSIAN RELIEF.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9548) for the relief of distressed and starving people of Russia, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9548, the Russian relief bill, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. ROGERS, Mr. TEMPLE, and Mr. CONNALLY of Texas.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 238. Joint resolution to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 955 of the Revised Statutes by extending the jurisdiction of courts in cases of revivor."

PRINTING OF SENATE TARIFF HEARINGS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Committee on Printing Senate concurrent resolution No. 17, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 17.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 3,500 copies of the hearings before the Committee on Finance of the Senate on the bill (H. R. 7456) to provide revenue, to regulate commerce with foreign countries, to encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes, revised and indexed, of which 2,000 copies shall be printed as separates, by schedules (including not to exceed three supplemental volumes), 1,000 copies for the use of the Committee on Finance of the Senate and 1,000 copies for the use of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be held for compilation by volume, of which 500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate document room and 1,000 copies for the use of the House document room: Provided, That the compiled edition only shall be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the committee having this referred to it has considered the same and has reported it back with the recommendation that it do pass. It is largely technical, and it is for the use of the committees. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the President's message.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think there are one or two gentlemen on this side who possibly would like to have a little time in general debate upon this subject.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] desires to address the House upon the question of the American valuation plan. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] and his committee, including the minority members, would like to occupy some time in the discussion of their preliminary report upon the agricultural situation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The only thing I had in mind is whether or not it might facilitate matters to have control of the time placed somewhere for the day.

Mr. MONDELL. I think it would. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time may be controlled equally by the gentleman from Tennessee and by myself.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, before the question is put, may I ask the gentleman as to when probably the bill that provides for assistance to the Patent Office by an increase of salaries and force will be considered? That bill has been on the calendar for a long time. My information is that the condition in the Patent Office is inconceivably bad.

Mr. MONDELL. It could not be considered, of course, until after the holidays, in any event.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is it expected to be considered soon after the holidays?

Mr. MONDELL. I think there are a number of matters in that connection that will have to be taken into consideration. The Committee on Appropriations will be able to do something for the Patent Office, I hope.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It is being stated in the press constantly—and it is stated to Members otherwise—that not only are applications for patents unduly postponed but that the industries of the country are being interfered with by the failure to issue patents. That is due to the fact that there is an insufficient force.

Mr. MONDELL. I think there have been some rather exaggerated statements made in regard to that, although the condition is not satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the time for debate be controlled, one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the President's message.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly the House resolved itsely into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the President's message, with Mr. BURTON in the chair.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have here several articles purchased in a department store in one of our large cities, all imported articles. I shall give to the House the price paid for each article abroad, the amount of duty paid on every article, and, except in some instances, the amount of freight on each of those articles.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. DUNBAR. Is the amount of duty paid based upon the price paid in the European markets?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir. They are all articles which paid an ad valorem duty, and those duties are all based upon the foreign value.

Mr. DUNBAR. Not upon the proposed American valuation?

Mr. FORDNEY. No, sir; not upon the proposed American valuation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. How recently have the duties been paid upon those articles?

Mr. FORDNEY. I shall give the date of the import, invoice, and date of entry.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I would like to get along, but I will yield.

Mr. MILLER. I was just going to ask if the gentleman from Michigan would have any objection to stating the place where those articles were purchased?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I will state that they were all purchased, with the exception of a very few, in the city of Chicago, but I would rather not mention the name of the firm. I have the sales slips with the firm's name on them.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is sure to be a reliable firm?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; a reliable firm; wealthy at least; I do not know how reliable otherwise.

Opposition to the pending tariff measure is readily traced not to the American producer, not to the man who deals chiefly in American-made products, but to the man who produces or purchases abroad and the man whose chief interest is in bringing the product of cheap foreign labor to the American market.

Those interested in importing enterprises are well organized and spending large sums of money in an effort to make you and me believe that what they seek is for the country's general welfare. The importer is working to delay or defeat tariff legislation, and to accomplish his end he is centering his criticism on the American valuation plan, without which, on account of present chaotic world-wide conditions, it will be most difficult to write a tariff measure at this time that will afford the slightest degree of protection against countries where protection is most needed.

In opposing the American valuation plan the importer tells us that under its operation he will be obliged to materially increase prices. Boil down his propaganda and you will find he presents no argument to show the principle is wrong. His complaint is that the rates are too high. Neither of his contentions are true.

If we are to have stable tariff rates, ad valorem duties must be predicated on a stable basis. Foreign values are the very personification of instability, and it is on the foreign value that ad valorem rates are now assessed. The manufacturer in the United States wants reasonable, stable, and consistent protection upon which he can depend. He wants protection against the country of low production costs rather than the country of high production costs. He wants the American valuation plan to prevail. The importer welcomes the extreme fluctuations and the instability of the present system. He welcomes the present conditions which so harass his competitor, the domestic producer, and the man who deals in the product of American labor. Where protection is most needed by the domestic producer, the importer is most anxious to have the rate abnormally low, for it affords him the opportunity to displace the American-made product with a foreign article. With a wide margin to work on he can close the American factory. He wants foreign valuation to be the basis for levying ad valorem duties. He wants it with all its inequalities, its fluctuations, and its instability. In it he sees the opportunity for excess profits, and the more unscrupulous importer welcomes the opportunity it affords for fraudulent undervaluations.

Now, in a population, gentlemen, of 107,000,000 of people there are, in round numbers, 2,000 importers. There are 317 corporations in the United States, and a very large percentage of those corporations are manufacturers. There are many individuals and copartnerships that are manufacturing, and the 2,000 importers whom I mention to-day are spending a large sum of money in advertising, as I shall show you before I conclude, in opposition to American valuation.

Too little is known regarding the importer and his margin of profits; his invoice, generally speaking, is not open to public inspection. However, I have some information here to-day from the invoices from an importer. It should be of keen interest to the House and to the country. It squarely discloses the abnormal profits an importer can exact.

The range of prices in various countries on comparable articles is glaringly great, and under the present system of assessing duties on foreign values the amount of duty collected on an article from one country differs widely from the amount of duty on a comparable article imported from some other country.

At this point permit me to say that last year we received imports from 111 countries or governments or subdivisions of governments. Nearly every one of the 111 governments had a different cost of production and each and every country on a comparable article paid a different amount of duty on that article when landed in the United States. Such a law is inequitable.

There would be some justification in the present system if the larger duty were assessed against a country where production costs are the lowest and protection is most needed. Unfortunately, however, the present system operates in a converse manner. Where the foreign value is abnormally low and protection is most essential, the amount of duty is abnormally low, but where the foreign value is high and protection is needed the least, the duty is correspondingly high.

Aside from correcting the troublesome question of undervaluation, the one big purpose for assessing ad valorem duties on values in the American market is to make the amount of duty on a given commodity uniform, regardless of the country of origin or fluctuations in the foreign value. How obviously unfair it would be if your local taxes were assessed on cost rather than actual value. Let us suppose two men had adjoining lots, that the one acquired his through a forced sale at one-half its value, and that the other man paid as much for his lot as the lot was worth. For the purpose of taxation would it not be glaringly unfair to value one lot at $5,000 and the other at $10,000? Would not the system be especially objectionable if the assessor through lack of means of verification was obliged to rely almost wholly on the statement of the property holder as to the purchase price, and thus an unscrupulous taxpayer could incorrectly state the purchase price and avoid a portion of the tax which the honest taxpayer would be assessed? That, however, is about the way the assessing of ad valorem duties on foreign values operates.

When the foreign value is low the duty is low, and when the foreign value is high, the duty is correspondingly high, and in addition the temptation for undervaluation is ever present to the unscrupulous importer.

I recently received a copy of a letter sent by a manufacturer to an importer. The manufacturer begins the letter by acknowledging the receipt of literature in opposition to American valuation, and states that in all of it he can not find one argument against the principle involved, that all the figures set forth purport to show that the rates are too high. That, the manufacturer contends, was a matter for discussion and involved no principle upon which they differed. Continuing, the manufacturer's letter is in part as follows:

> There are misstatements galore—at least, implied misstatements—when such items as 33 per cent profits are introduced as typical. The large majority of foreign textiles, raw materials, furs, crockery, and fancy goods, to say nothing of chemicals, metals, etc., are sold through agents of foreign houses and delivered to wholesale buyers by commission houses, on commissions amounting to from 2½ to 10 per cent. These sales would constitute the basis of prices at which commodities could be bought in wholesale quantities in this market—not the prices with a retail profit of from 25 per cent to 50 per cent added. On such articles where, because of their fancy nature and speculative character, a high rate of profit is customary at wholesale, the high duty is justified—being a quasi luxury tax—just as is the high profit which the importer imposes on the consumer to cover the risks he takes for speculating in his behalf.
> In any event, these items could receive the benefit of lower rates if a presentation of proper reasons justified such procedure.
>
> There is no reason why a different amount of duty should be collected on products from France, Japan, or Russia, simply because they cost less in one country than in another.
> There is no reason why you, an honest importer, should run the risk of the vast opportunities for undervaluation due to changes abroad in currency values and economic upsets, which are available to less scrupulous merchants during the next two or three years.

I have examined much of the propaganda in opposition to American valuation, and the manufacturer whose letter I have quoted in part has summed up this situation accurately. A valid argument against the principle involved is lacking. The whole opposition is founded on the question of rates and on alleged increases in prices to the consumer they predict will result from the new rates.

In my estimation an importer condemns himself when he endeavors to show that a rate of say 25 per cent on the American wholesale price is equivalent to 100 or 150 per cent based on the foreign price; for to prove his contention he must show a very alarming discrepancy in domestic and foreign production costs. He must show the necessity for protection, and last but not least he must show his own excessive and exorbitant profits.

At this point I want to call attention to this: A man whose name I will not mention saw an article by a large importing firm in Chicago opposing American valuation and later saw my reply thereto. He informed me that a friend of his had recently returned from Germany, where he had purchased a knife. That knife was purchased for 18 or 19 marks at retail in Germany. The exchange value of those marks that day was 9.6 cents in gold. That knife was made by the firm of J. A. Henckle, a manufacturer of high-grade cutlery in Germany. His name is stamped on the blade of the knife in Germany, where his factory is located, and this gentleman said when that knife was given to him, knowing that a certain importing house in Chicago handled this manufacturer's goods, he went to the store the next morning, and while he could not find an exact duplicate he did obtain from them this knife made by J. A. Henckle, with the same trade-mark and the mark of "made in Germany," because under the law goods sold in this country made in a foreign country must have the country of origin stamped on the article. He paid $5 for that knife, containing two blades with a file, a knife of less value than the one purchased in Germany a few weeks before for 9.6 cents at retail. He did not send me the sales slip of this knife. I went to the Secretary of the Treasury and asked him to give me a man whom I could send to Chicago to purchase some articles. That man purchased this knife and furnished me a sales slip at that same department store week before last, the same knife, and I have the sales slip—$5—sold by the same firm, the same knife, less valuable than the one sold in Germany a short time ago for 9.6 cents. I went further, and I have here, my friends, a copy of several invoices. I have the prices abroad in foreign currency of several articles. I have the wholesale prices in gold and the rates of duty; I have every obtainable item of cost to lay these several articles on the counter in Chicago, and show the increases in selling prices.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield in connection with that knife? Under the pending tariff bill on the American valuation what would be——

Mr. FORDNEY. Under existing law that knife pays 55 per cent ad valorem duty.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the American valuation in the new bill what would be the amount of duty on that knife?

Mr. FORDNEY. About a month ago I received two knives from a man in Chicago. The knives in question were made in Germany by the firm of J. A. Henckle. One was purchased in Germany by a traveler at a retail store, and the price paid was the equivalent of 9.6 cents. The second knife was comparable in value. It was purchased in a large department store in Chicago, and the price paid was $5. The department store in question imports foreign merchandise on a tremendously large scale and claims to have a foreign organization well known in every country in the world. They are assiduously distributing propaganda and sending their men about the country addressing Rotary Clubs and similar organizations in an effort to mold sentiment against the new bill.

I should say that the wholesale selling value of that knife would have been in round numbers $4 per dozen, perhaps $6 per dozen, in the United States. Forty per cent duty was added, making it $2.40 a dozen, and that knife costs in round numbers $1.25 a dozen now; so the duty would be 40 per cent, or $2.40, as against 55 per cent, or $1.25 or $1.50, whatever it may be.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It seems to me the gentleman's whole argument in reference to this is that this Chicago firm is an unconscionable profiteer.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is no question in my mind about that, and I want to prove it to you before I conclude.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not see how that relates to the American valuation.

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank you, my friend. I realize that your question was a friendly one and brought out the necessary information which I wish to present to the House.

The discovery of the low-priced German cutlery of J. A. Henckle offered for sale at high prices by the department store that is leading the fight against the American valuation plan induced me to cause some investigations to be made. I withhold the name of the department store, because my object is not to center criticism on them when so many others preeminently merit a share of it. My purpose to-day is to center attention on the selfish motives prompting the importer's propaganda. To do this I have had a number of invoices examined covering importations by the particular department store selling the J. A. Henckle 9-cent knife for the modest price of $5, and is spending large sums of money to lead you and me to believe they have the country's general welfare at heart, while making all manner of misstatements in order to defeat American valuation. I have secured indisputable evidence shedding light on costs and selling prices of the department store to which I have referred, which, so it happens, is one of America's largest importing establishments.

I sent a man to Chicago to purchase these articles, and all of them were purchased in the one store in Chicago. These items here [indicating] came from another place.

I have given you the substance of the matter on the knife.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me finish this and I will yield to you.

After securing information from invoices covering importations by this store of a number of articles of everyday usage, the articles were traced into the retail department and purchases were made over the counter in the usual manner. As evidence I have official statements in regard to foreign costs, including all dutiable charges and the amount of duty paid, together with all other items of cost that the invoice discloses. I have with me the articles purchased, together with original purchase slips. I have not sought or secured extreme cases. I have called for and obtained representative cases. I will not pick out the most glaring disclosures but will present information to the House in regard to every sample furnished me.

But this, let me say to you, that one hour ago a man stepped into my office. He is connected with the Home Market Club of Boston. I know him very well, and he is an estimable gentleman. He gave me some interesting information which I jotted down. He said that he recently made a request to one of the Boston papers to publish an article in answer to an attack made by the National Retail Dry Goods Association on American valuation. The editor replied that while he was heartily in favor of American valuation he could not print the article opposing American valuation, because every member of the press had been notified direct from Chicago, through a group of Chicago importers, that any paper printing any article in favor of American valuation would immediately lose the advertising of the importers.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They are not running newspapers; they are running advertising sheets.

Mr. FORDNEY. Surely. Wait a minute. The gentleman made a most earnest request that the editor print the article offered by him. The editor finally agreed to call up members of the retail board of the Boston Chamber of Commerce and ask for permission to print the article. The editor notified my friend later that the association emphatically protested, and that he could not print the article; that if he did he would lose the trade.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FREAR. I can give the gentleman names of witnesses and a case of substantially the same kind where a firm in Chicago intervened with advertisers in another city and threatened to withdraw patronage from a paper publishing criticisms of like nature.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Those instructions came from Chicago.

Mr. FREAR. Where the threats were made against a newspaper?

Mr. FORDNEY. And came from the store where those goods were purchased.

Mr. IRELAND. I notice that the Chicago importers are getting a good deal of attention. Are all the other importers in the United States perfectly innocent?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have nothing more against the Chicago importers than importers elsewhere in the United States. Chicago, however, seems to be leading the fight against American valuation.

Mr. IRELAND. I hope the gentleman will have other examples to offer.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, I will; but the seat of war is in Chicago, brother.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. There are several very large firms in Chicago. I am inclined to think we should like to know who the firm is that is guilty of these practices. Is it Marshall Field & Co., or Sears, Roebuck & Co., or who is it?

Mr. FORDNEY. If necessary, I will state it to the House. I would rather not make an attack upon any one particular firm. But it is Marshall Field & Co. And I have the sales slips for those articles.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. KING. Has the gentleman found any opposition to the American valuation plan from men who have money invested in foreign factories and who desire to ship their produce into this country?

Mr. FORDNEY. I understand that all the importers of the country are in this movement to oppose American valuation. But I do not know of any particular instance. But I assume their interests are with other men who import. Their natural interests would be where the dollars and cents are.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. When the gentleman was interrupted by the gentleman from Kentucky he was about to say something about having seen the duty on the invoices, but he did not follow up the statement because of the interruption.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am going to print it in the RECORD.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I think it would be very helpful and interesting.

Mr. FORDNEY. This comes from the collector of customs, who identifies almost all of the articles as having been passed upon by him.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Referring to this fight that these importers, Marshall Field and others, are making on this American valuation plan, and also in regard to the newspapers in Boston, I want to say a word to the gentleman from Michigan first, and then I want to ask him a question. That has been one of the complaints of the Democrats throughout the country for many years, that the Republicans control the press of the country largely, and we could not get our recommendations and rates of tariff duties before the American people. It seems now that you have a fight among yourselves, so far as big business and big interests are concerned; a fight as between big importers and the American manufacturers. Now, I want to ask you this question: Have you any requests from the American people generally, outside of a portion of the manufacturers of this country, who want the American valuation?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, I have more than a Jew peddler undoing a pack. [Laughter.] I have more literature on the question asking for American valuation than you could lift.

Mr. OLDFIELD. They do not come from the people of America, but only from a part of the manufacturers of America?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no. A manufacturer is not necessarily a foreigner. Every one of them comes from the people of America, whereas the requests against the American valuation come from the man whose interest is in peddling the product of foreign labor in the domestic markets, or a profiteer, or a man robbing the Treasury of the United States, or a foreigner. [Applause on the Republican side.] I say a man steals when he undervalues the goods he is bringing in to escape duties. He is no less a thief than the man who robs you during the night by breaking into your house while you are asleep. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. Is it not a fact that the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means have shown that the undervaluations were less than one-half of 1 per cent in this country?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but there was never a bigger lie uttered by anyone on earth. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. The officials of your own Department of the Treasury said it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am not contradicting the gentleman. But in the New York office last year there were 5,987 cases of undervaluation or incorrect classification discovered. How many passed without discovery no one knows, and in four months of this year, my friend, there were 3,200 cases of undervaluation or reclassification. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. OLDFIELD. The information that we got at the public hearings does not bear out that statement.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not care about the public hearings. That is the record.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. A gentleman asked you a moment ago whether this desire for the American valuation has been expressed by any other than American manufacturers. Has not the desire for the American valuation been voiced also by the labor organizations throughout the country, those who toil, in the last few weeks? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman from Michigan to say that one firm in Chicago, Marshall Field & Co., determines what can be and what can not be printed in the Boston papers?

Mr. FORDNEY. I did not say that, brother.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say it, and that is why I am asking the question.

Mr. FORDNEY. No. Let me repeat what I said. I said it came from the importers in Chicago. The gentleman I referred to did not tell me the name of the firm. That was his language. I gave it to you as the gentleman dictated it an hour ago in my office.

Mr. MANN. I understand that the gentleman said that the importers in Chicago control what can be and what can not be printed in the Boston papers.

Mr. FORDNEY. A gentleman has taken away my memorandum for a moment, but I will get it and have the gentleman read exactly what I said. I said it came from the importers in Chicago.

Mr. MANN. That is what I am asking. I understood the gentleman to say that the importers in Chicago determined what could be and what could not be printed in the Chicago daily papers.

Mr. FORDNEY. As I remember the language, that is it identically.

Mr. MANN. Well, then, that only shows what power we have in Chicago. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, you are all right, and Chicago is all right; but there are some fellows in every large city who have but little principle. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, gentlemen, listen to this, if you please. Chicago is not alone in this propaganda. I am not making an attack upon Chicago. But the bulk of the information came from Chicago. In connection with one of my exhibits I have the following information pertaining to an identical or comparable article: First, the entry number; second, the date of entry; third, the consular invoice number; fourth, the date and place of consultation; fifth, invoice description; sixth, foreign value or purchase price set forth in invoice in foreign currency; seventh, foreign value or purchase price converted into United States gold; eighth, the dutiable value in United States gold; ninth, the rate of duty; tenth, the amount of duty; eleventh, all nondutiable elements of cost that appear in the invoice; twelfth, the total net laid-down price, less in some instances the transportation cost, not appearing in the invoices and not obtainable; thirteenth, the retail selling price; fourteenth, the difference between cost and selling price, the percentage of increase.

For the purpose of clearness and brevity I shall omit some of the details in price in foreign currency, the rate of exchange, and so forth, and shall give prices only in United States gold. I have it all here, and if gentlemen wish me to exhibit those details I will do so. Take the article of lip sticks. I prefer the lip without any stick. Date of entry, November 16, 1921; the French selling price; the duty is 60 per cent ad valorem. Now, for the purpose of hurrying along I will give you the total, and I will put in all these elements that I have named. The total net laid-down cost, excluding transportation, is 82.69 cents.

Mr. COPLEY. For what unit?

Mr. FORDNEY. Lip sticks.

Mr. COPLEY. How many?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Not how many lips, but sticks.
